 Snatch me, just mounting, from the blest abode,
 Assist the fiends and tear me from my God!

No, fly me, fly me! far as pole from pole;
 Rise Alps between us, and whole oceans roll!

¹ like those ... urn The ancient Romans kept lamps perpetually burning in their tombs.

² matin lamp Light used for the dawn service.

³ bead I.e., rosary bead.

⁴ censer ... fragrance roll Incense was burned and its smoke diffused by the swinging of a container called a censer.

Ah come not, write not, think not once of me,
 Nor share one pang of all I felt for thee.
 Thy oaths I quit,^o thy memory resign; release you from Forget, renounce me, hate whate'er was mine.

Fair eyes, and tempting looks (which yet I view!)
 Long loved, adored ideas! all adieu!
 O grace serene! oh virtue heav'nly fair!
 Divine oblivion of low-thoughted care!
 Fresh blooming hope, gay daughter of the sky!
 And faith, our early immortality!⁵
 Enter, each mild, each amicable guest;
 Receive, and wrap me in eternal rest!

See in her cell sad Eloisa spread,
 Propped on some tomb, a neighbour of the dead!
 In each low wind methinks a spirit calls,
 And more than echoes talk along the walls.
 Here, as I watched the dying lamps around,
 From yonder shrine I heard a hollow sound.
 "Come, sister, come! (it said, or seemed to say)
 Thy place is here, sad sister, come away!
 Once like thyself, I trembled, wept, and prayed,
 Love's victim then, though now a sainted maid:
 But all is calm in this eternal sleep;
 Here grief forgets to groan, and love to weep,
 Ev'n superstition loses every fear:
 For God, not man, absolves our frailties here."

I come, I come! Prepare your roseate bow'rs,
 Celestial palms, and ever-blooming flow'rs.
 Thither, where sinners may have rest, I go,
 Where flames refined in breasts seraphic glow.
 Thou, Abelard, the last sad office⁶ pay,
 And smooth my passage to the realms of day;
 See my lips tremble, and my eyeballs roll,
 Suck my last breath, and catch my flying soul!⁷
 Ah no—in sacred vestments may'st thou stand,
 The hallowed taper trembling in thy hand,
 Present the Cross before my lifted eye,
 Teach me at once, and learn of^o me to die. from
 Ah then, thy once-loved Eloisa see!
 It will be then no crime to gaze on me.
 See from my cheek the transient roses fly!

⁵ faith ... immortality I.e., faith in an afterlife provides the first experience of immortality.

⁶ last sad office Last rites.

⁷ Suck ... soul It was commonly believed that at the time of death the soul left the body through the mouth.

See the last sparkle languish in my eye!
Till every motion, pulse, and breath, be o'er;
And ev'n my Abelard be loved no more.

335 O death all-eloquent! you only prove
What dust we doat on, when 'tis man we love.

Then too, when fate shall thy fair frame destroy,
(That cause of all my guilt, and all my joy)
In trance ecstatic may thy pangs be drowned,
340 Bright clouds descend, and angels watch thee round,
From op'ning skies may streaming glories shine,
And saints embrace thee with a love like mine.

May one kind grave unite each hapless name,¹
And graft my love immortal on thy fame!

345 Then, ages hence, when all my woes are o'er,
When this rebellious heart shall beat no more;
If ever chance two wand'ring lovers brings
To Paraclete's white walls and silver springs,
O'er the pale marble shall they join their heads,
350 And drink the falling tears each other sheds;
Then sadly say, with mutual pity moved,
"Oh may we never love as these have loved!"
From the full choir when loud Hosannas² rise,
And swell the pomp of dreadful sacrifice,³
355 Amid that scene, if some relenting eye
Glance on the stone where our cold relics lie,
Devotion's self shall steal a thought from heav'n,
One human tear shall drop, and be forgiv'n.
And sure if fate some future bard shall join

360 In sad similitude of griefs to mine,
Condemned whole years in absence to deplore,^o mourn
And image charms he must behold no more;
Such if there be, who loves so long, so well,
Let him our sad, our tender story tell;⁴
365 The well-sung woes will sooth my pensive ghost;
He best can paint 'em, who shall feel 'em most.

— 1717

¹ [Pope's note] Abelard and Eloisa were interred in the same grave, or in monuments adjoining, in the monastery of the Paraclete. He died in the year 1142, she in 1163.

² Hosannas Exclamations of praise.

³ dreadful sacrifice Term for the celebration of the Eucharist (mass), in which Christ's sacrifice is reenacted.

⁴ future bard ... tell Pope is referring to himself. Though these lines are not confession or autobiographical fact, he probably hints at his feelings for Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, who was in Turkey with her husband at the time. This was well before Pope's fascination with her had turned to enmity.

from An Essay on Man

THE DESIGN

H Having proposed to write some pieces on Human Life and Manners, such as, to use my Lord Bacon's expression, "come home to men's business and bosoms," I thought it more satisfactory to begin with considering Man in the abstract, his nature and his state: since to prove any moral duty, to enforce any moral precept, or to examine the perfection or imperfection of any creature whatsoever, it is necessary first to know what condition and relation it is placed in, and what is the proper end and purpose of its being.

The science of Human Nature is, like all other sciences, reduced to a few clear points: there are not many certain truths in this world. It is therefore in the anatomy of the mind, as in that of the body; more good will accrue to mankind by attending to the large, open, and perceptible parts, than by studying too much such finer nerves and vessels, the conformations and uses of which will for ever escape our observation. The disputes are all upon these last; and, I will venture to say, they have less sharpened the wits than the hearts of men against each other, and have diminished the practice more than advanced the theory of morality. If I could flatter myself that this Essay has any merit, it is in steering betwixt the extremes of doctrines seemingly opposite, in passing over terms utterly unintelligible and in forming a temperate, yet not inconsistent, and a short, yet not imperfect, system of ethics.

This I might have done in prose; but I chose verse, and even rhyme, for two reasons. The one will appear obvious; that principles, maxims, or precepts, so written, both strike the reader more strongly at first, and are more easily retained by him afterwards: the other may seem odd, but it is true: I found I could express them more shortly this way than in prose itself; and nothing is more certain than that much of the force as well as grace of arguments or instructions depends on their conciseness. I was unable to treat this part of my subject more in detail without becoming dry and tedious; or more poetically without sacrificing perspicuity to ornament, without wandering from the precision, or breaking the chain of reasoning. If any man can unite all these without diminution of any of them, I freely confess he will compass a thing above my capacity.

What is now published is only to be considered as a general Map of Man, marking out no more than the greater parts, their extent, their limits, and their connection, but leaving the particular to be more fully delineated in the charts which are to follow; consequently these epistles in their progress (if I have health and leisure to make any progress) will be less dry, and more susceptible of poetical ornament. I am here only opening the fountains, and clearing the passage: to deduce the rivers, to follow them in their course, and to observe their effects, may be a task more agreeable.

EPISTLE I

A wake, my St. John!¹ leave all meaner things
To low ambition, and the pride of kings.
Let us (since life can little more supply
Than just to look about us and to die)
Expatiate² free o'er all this scene of man;
A mighty maze! but not without a plan;
A wild, where weeds and flow'rs promiscuous shoot,
Or garden, tempting with forbidden fruit.
Together let us beat³ this ample field,
Try what the open, what the covert⁴ yield;
The latent tracts, the giddy heights, explore
Of all who blindly creep, or sightless soar;
Eye Nature's walks, shoot Folly as it flies,
And catch the Manners living as they rise;
Laugh where we must, be candid⁵ where we can, generous
But vindicate the ways of God to man.

Say first, of God above or man below,
What can we reason, but from what we know?

¹ St. John Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke, to whom Pope addressed all four epistles of the Essay on Man. Bolingbroke served as Secretary of State under the Tory administration of 1710–14, but fled to France in order to avoid being charged with treason when George I ascended the throne. He was pardoned in 1723 and returned to England, where he involved himself in the opposition to Robert Walpole's Whig government and continued his philosophical writing.

² Expatiate Meaning both to speak at length and to wander.

³ beat Hunting term, meaning to flush game out from fields.

⁴ covert Thick brush that could provide shelter to game.

Of man, what see we but his station here,
From which to reason, or to which refer?
Through worlds unnumbered though the God be known,
'Tis ours to trace him only in our own.
He, who through vast immensity can pierce,
See worlds on worlds compose one universe,
Observe how system^o into system runs, solar system
What other planets circle other suns,
What varied being peoples every star,
May tell why Heav'n has made us as we are.
But of this frame the bearings, and the ties,
The strong connections, nice dependencies,
Gradations just, has thy pervading soul
Looked through? or can a part contain the whole?
Is the great chain—that draws all to agree
And, drawn, supports^o—upheld by God, or thee? sustains

Presumptuous man! the reason wouldst thou find
Why formed so weak, so little, and so blind!
First, if thou canst, the harder reason guess,
Why formed no weaker, blinder, and no less!
Ask of thy mother earth why oaks are made
Taller or stronger than the weeds they shade?
Or ask of yonder argent fields above⁵ night sky
Why Jove's satellites⁵ are less than Jove?
Of systems possible, if 'tis confessed
That wisdom infinite must form the best,
Where all must full, or not coherent, be,⁶
And all that rises, rise in due degree;
Then, in the scale of reas'ning life, 'tis plain
There must be, somewhere, such a rank⁷ as man,
And all the question (wrangle e'er so long)
Is only this, if God has placed him wrong?
Respecting man, whatever wrong we call,
May, must be right, as relative to all.
In human works, though laboured on with pain,
A thousand movements scarce one purpose gain;
In God's, one single can its end produce,
Yet serves to second too some other use.
So man, who here seems principal alone,

⁵ Jove's satellites Jupiter's moons. The last "e" in "satellites" is here pronounced, making this a four-syllable word. (Pope uses the Latin pronunciation.)

⁶ Where ... be The Great Chain of Being cannot contain any gaps; each level must be filled.

⁷ such a rank I.e., one made up of rational animals.

Perhaps acts second to some sphere unknown,
Touches some wheel, or verges to some goal;
60 'Tis but a part we see, and not a whole.

When the proud steed shall know why man restrains
His fiery course, or drives him o'er the plains;
When the dull ox, why now he breaks the clod,
Is now a victim, and now Egypt's god:¹
65 Then shall man's pride and dullness comprehend
His actions', passions', being's use and end;
Why doing, suffering, checked, impelled; and why
This hour a slave, the next a deity.

Then say not man's imperfect, Heav'n in fault;
70 Say rather, man's as perfect as he ought;
His knowledge measured to his state and place,
His time a moment, and a point his space.
If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
What matter soon or late, or here or there?
75 The blest today is as completely so
As who began a thousand years ago.

Heav'n from all creatures hides the book of Fate,
All but the page prescribed, their present state;
From brutes what men, from men what spirits know, 80 Or who could suffer being here below?
The lamb thy riot^o dooms to bleed today, extravagance
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?
Pleased to the last, he crops the flow'ry food,
And licks the hand just raised to shed his blood.
85 Oh, blindness to the future! kindly giv'n,
That each may fill the circle marked by Heav'n;
Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish or a sparrow fall,
Atoms or systems into ruin hurled,
90 And now a bubble burst, and now a world.

Hope humbly then; with trembling pinions^o wings
soar;
Wait the great teacher, Death, and God adore!
What future bliss, he gives not thee to know,
But gives that hope to be thy blessing now.
95 Hope springs eternal in the human breast:
Man never is, but always to be blest:
The soul, uneasy and confined from home,²
Rests and expatiates^o in a life to come. roams

¹ Egypt's god The Egyptians worshiped Apis, the sacred bull of Memphis, as a god.

² from home I.e., away from its heavenly home.

Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
100 Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind;
His soul proud science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk, or Milky Way;
Yet simple Nature to his hope has giv'n,
Behind the cloud-topped hill, an humbler heav'n;
105 Some safer world in depth of woods embraced,
Some happier island in the wat'ry waste,
Where slaves once more their native land behold,
No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold!
To be, contents his natural desire,
110 He asks no angel's wing, no seraph's fire;
But thinks, admitted to that equal^o sky, egalitarian
His faithful dog shall bear him company.

Go, wiser thou! and in thy scale of sense
Weigh thy opinion against Providence;
115 Call imperfection what thou fancy'st such,
Say, here he gives too little, there too much;
Destroy all creatures for thy sport or gust,^o taste
Yet cry, if man's unhappy, God's unjust;
If man alone engross not Heav'n's high care,
120 Alone made perfect here, immortal there:
Snatch from his hand the balance³ and the rod,
Rejudge his justice, be the God of God!

In pride, in reas'ning pride, our error lies;
All quit their sphere and rush into the skies.
125 Pride still is aiming at the blest abodes,
Men would be angels, angels would be gods.
Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell,
Aspiring to be angels, men rebel;
And who but wishes to invert the laws
130 Of order, sins against th' Eternal Cause.

Ask for what end the heav'nly bodies shine;
Earth for whose use? Pride answers, "'Tis for mine.
For me kind Nature wakes her genial^o pow'r, generative
Suckles each herb, and spreads out every flow'r;
135 Annual, for me the grape, the rose renew
The juice nectareous, and the balmy dew;
For me the mine a thousand treasures brings;
For me health gushes from a thousand springs;
Seas roll to waft me, suns to light me rise;
140 My footstool earth, my canopy⁴ the skies."

³ balance Scales of justice.

⁴ canopy Covering suspended above a throne.

But errs not Nature from this gracious end,
 From burning suns when livid deaths descend,¹
 When earthquakes swallow, or when tempests sweep
 Towns to one grave, whole nations to the deep?
 "No," 'tis replied, "the first Almighty cause
 Acts not by partial, but by gen'ral laws;
 Th' exceptions few; some change since all began,
 And what created perfect?"—Why then man?
 If the great end be human happiness,
 Then Nature deviates; and can man do less?
 As much that end a constant course requires
 Of show'rs and sunshine, as of man's desires;
 As much eternal springs and cloudless skies
 As men forever temp'rate, calm, and wise.
 If plagues or earthquakes break not Heav'n's design,
 Why then a Borgia or a Catiline?²
 Who knows but he whose hand the lightning forms,
 Who heaves old ocean, and who wings the storms,
 Pours fierce ambition in a Caesar's mind,
 Or turns young Ammon³ loose to scourge mankind?
 From pride, from pride our very reas'ning springs;
 Account for moral as for nat'ral things:
 Why charge we Heav'n in those, in these⁴ acquit?
 In both, to reason right is to submit.

Better for us, perhaps it might appear,
 Were there⁵ all harmony, all virtue here;
 That never air or ocean felt the wind;
 That never passion discomposed the mind:
 But ALL subsists by elemental strife,
 And passions are the elements of life.
 The gen'ral order, since the whole began,
 Is kept in Nature, and is kept in man.

What would this man? Now upward will he soar,
 And, little less than angel, would be more;
 Now looking downwards, just as grieved appears

From ... descend Incidences of pestilence and fever increased during the hottest months.

² Borgia The Borgias were a Renaissance Italian family notorious for the cruelty of their crimes; Cataline Lucius Sergius Cataline, the greedy Roman conspirator who was publicly denounced by Cicero for plotting against the republic.

³ Ammon Alexander the Great.

⁴ in those The former; in these The latter.

⁵ there I.e., in the natural realm (whereas "here" indicates the moral realm of man).

To want the strength of bulls, the fur of bears.
 Made for his use all creatures if he call,
 Say what their use, had he the pow'rs of all?
 Nature to these, without profusion kind,
 180 The proper organs, proper pow'rs assigned;
 Each seeming want compensated of course,⁶
 Here with degrees of swiftness, there of force;⁷
 All in exact proportion to the state;
 Nothing to add, and nothing to abate.
 185 Each beast, each insect, happy in its own;
 Is Heav'n unkind to man, and man alone?
 Shall he alone, whom rational we call,
 Be pleased with nothing, if not blest with all?

The bliss of man (could pride that blessing find)
 190 Is not to act or think beyond mankind;
 No pow'rs of body or of soul to share,
 But what his nature and his state can bear.
 Why has not man a microscopic eye?
 For this plain reason, man is not a fly.
 195 Say what the use, were finer optics giv'n,
 To inspect a mite, not comprehend the heav'n?
 Or touch, if tremblingly alive all o'er,
 To smart and agonize at every pore?
 Or quick effluvia⁸ darting through the brain,
 200 Die of a rose in aromatic pain?
 If nature thundered in his op'ning ears,
 And stunned him with the music of the spheres,⁹
 How would he wish that Heav'n had left him still
 The whisp'ring zephyr,^o and the purling rill? breeze
 205 Who finds not Providence all good and wise,
 Alike in what it gives, and what denies?

Far as creation's ample range extends,
 The scale of sensual, mental pow'rs ascends:
 Mark how it mounts to man's imperial race
 210 From the green myriads in the peopled grass:
 What modes of sight betwixt each wide extreme,

⁶ of course Naturally; as a matter of course.

⁷ [Pope's note] It is a certain axiom in the anatomy of creatures, that in proportion as they are formed for strength, their swiftness is lessened; or as they are formed for swiftness, their strength is lessened.

⁸ effluvia Sensory perceptions were thought to result from "effluvia," minuscule particles which bombarded the pores in streams.

music of the spheres Music believed to be made by the planets which only angels could hear.

The mole's dim curtain, and the lynx's beam:¹
 Of smell, the headlong lioness between,
 And hound sagacious on the tainted² green:
 215 Of hearing, from the life that fills the flood
 To that which warbles through the vernal wood:
 The spider's touch, how exquisitely fine!
 Feels at each thread, and lives along the line:
 In the nice³ bee, what sense so subtly true precise 220 From pois'nous herbs extracts the healing dew:³
 How instinct varies in the grov'ling swine
 Compared, half-reas'ning elephant, with thine:
 'Twixt that and reason, what a nice barrier;
 Forever sep'rate, yet forever near!
 225 Remembrance and reflection how allied;
 What thin partitions sense from thought divide:
 And middle natures, how they long to join,
 Yet never pass th' insuperable line!
 Without this just gradation, could they be 230 Subjected these to those, or all to thee?
 The pow'rs of all subdued by thee alone,
 Is not thy reason all these pow'rs in one?

See, through this air, this ocean, and this earth,
 All matter quick,⁴ and bursting into birth.
 235 Above, how high progressive life may go!
 Around, how wide! how deep extend below!
 Vast Chain of Being, which from God began,
 Natures ethereal, human, angel, man,
 Beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see,
 240 No glass⁵ can reach! from infinite to thee,
 From thee to nothing!—On superior pow'rs
 Were we to press, inferior might on ours:
 Or in the full creation leave a void,
 Where, one step broken, the great scale's destroyed:
 245 From Nature's chain whatever link you strike,
 Tenth or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike.

And if each system in gradation roll,
 Alike essential to th' amazing whole,
 The least confusion but in one, not all

¹ mole's ... beam A popular theory of the time held that sight depended upon beams of light emitted from the eye.

² sagacious Possessing an acute sense of smell; tainted I.e., with the scent of the hunted animal.

³ healing dew Honey, which was often used for medicinal purposes.

⁴ quick Stirring with life.

⁵ glass Telescope or microscope.

250 That system only, but the whole, must fall.
 Let earth unbalanced from her orbit fly,
 Planets and suns run lawless through the sky;
 Let ruling angels from their spheres be hurled,
 Being on being wrecked, and world on world,
 255 Heav'n's whole foundations to their centre nod,
 And Nature tremble to the throne of God:
 All this dread order break—for whom? for thee?
 Vile worm!—oh, madness, pride, impiety!

What if the foot, ordained the dust to tread,
 260 Or hand to toil, aspired to be the head?
 What if the head, the eye, or ear repined
 To serve mere engines⁶ to the ruling mind? instruments
 Just as absurd for any part to claim
 To be another, in this gen'ral frame:
 265 Just as absurd to mourn the tasks or pains
 The great directing Mind of All ordains.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
 Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;
 That, changed through all, and yet in all the same,
 270 Great in the earth, as in th' ethereal frame,
 Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
 Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees;
 Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
 Spreads undivided, operates unspent,
 275 Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part,
 As full, as perfect in a hair as heart;
 As full, as perfect in vile man that mourns,
 As the rapt seraph that adores and burns;⁶
 To him no high, no low, no great, no small;
 280 He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals⁷ all. makes equal

Cease then, nor ORDER imperfection name;
 Our proper bliss depends on what we blame.
 Know thy own point: this kind, this due degree
 Of blindness, weakness, Heav'n bestows on thee.
 285 Submit—in this, or any other sphere,
 Secure to be as blest as thou canst bear:
 Safe in the hand of one disposing pow'r,
 Or in the natal, or the mortal hour.⁷
 All Nature is but art unknown to thee;

⁶ burns With holy love. Seraphs, the highest of the nine orders of angels, were generally depicted in flame. Their name comes from the root of a Greek word meaning "to burn."

⁷ mortal hour Hour of death.

All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
 All discord, harmony not understood;
 All partial evil, universal good:
 And, spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
 One truth is clear: Whatever IS, is RIGHT.

EPISTLE 2

Now then thyself, presume not God to scan;^o judge
 The proper study of mankind is man.
 Placed on this isthmus of a middle state,
 A being darkly wise, and rudely great:
 With too much knowledge for the skeptic side,
 With too much weakness for the Stoic's pride,
 He hangs between; in doubt to act or rest,
 In doubt to deem himself a God or beast,
 In doubt his mind or body to prefer,
 Born but to die, and reas'ning but to err;
 Alike in ignorance, his reason such,
 Whether he thinks too little, or too much:
 Chaos of thought and passion, all confused;
 Still by himself abused, or disabused;
 Created half to rise, and half to fall;
 Great lord of all things, yet a prey to all;
 Sole judge of truth, in endless error hurled:
 The glory, jest, and riddle of the world!

Go, wonderful creature! Mount where science guides;
 Go, measure earth, weigh air, and state the tides;
 Instruct the planets in what orbs to run,
 Correct old time, and regulate the sun;
 Go, soar with Plato to th' empyreal sphere,¹
 To the first good, first perfect, and first fair;
 Or tread the mazy^o round his foll'wers trod, labyrinthine
 And quitting sense² call imitating God;
 As Eastern priests in giddy circles run,³
 And turn their heads to imitate the sun.
 Go teach eternal wisdom how to rule—
 Then drop into thyself, and be a fool!

Superior beings, when of late they saw empyrean sphere Highest heavens.

² quitting sense Leaving the body, as in a trance, with a pun on abandoning good sense.

³ priests ... run Reference to dervishes, Muslim friars of various orders, some of which are known for their fantastic practices, such as whirling (hence the term "whirling dervish").

A mortal man unfold all Nature's law,
 Admired such wisdom in an earthly shape,
 And showed a Newton⁴ as we show an ape.

Could he, whose rules the rapid comet bind,
 Describe or fix one movement of his mind?
 Who saw its fires here rise, and there descend,
 Explain his own beginning, or his end?
 Alas, what wonder! Man's superior part
 Unchecked may rise, and climb from art to art,
 But when his own great work is but begun,
 What reason weaves, by passion is undone.
 Trace science, then, with modesty thy guide;
 First strip off all her equipage of pride,
 Deduct what is but vanity, or dress,
 Or learning's luxury, or idleness,
 Or tricks to show the stretch of human brain,
 Mere curious pleasure, or ingenious pain;
 Expunge the whole, or lop th' excrescent parts
 Of all, our vices have created arts.
 Then see how little the remaining sum,
 Which served the past, and must the times to come!

Two principles in human nature reign:
 Self-love, to urge, and reason, to restrain;
 Nor this a good, nor that a bad we call,
 Each works its end, to move or govern all;
 And to their proper operation still Ascribe all good; to their improper, ill.

Self-love, the spring of motion, acts^o the soul; activates
 Reason's comparing balance rules the whole.
 Man, but for that, no action could attend,
 And, but for this, were active to no end:
 Fixed like a plant on his peculiar^o spot, particular
 To draw nutrition, propagate, and rot;
 Or, meteor-like, flame lawless through the void,
 Destroying others, by himself destroyed.

Most strength the moving principle requires;
 Active its task, it prompts, impels, inspires.
 Sedate and quiet the comparing lies,
 Formed but to check, delib'rate, and advise.
 Self-love still stronger, as its objects nigh;
 Reason's at distance, and in prospect lie.
 That sees immediate good by present sense;
 Reason, the future and the consequence.

⁴ Newton Physicist and mathematician Sir Isaac Newton (1642–1727).

75 Thicker than arguments, temptations throng,
At best more watchful this, but that more strong.
The action of the stronger to suspend
Reason still use, to reason still attend:
Attention, habit and experience gains,
80 Each strengthens reason, and self-love restrains.

Let subtle schoolmen¹ teach these friends to fight,
More studious to divide than to unite,
And grace and virtue, sense and reason split,
With all the rash dexterity of wit:
85 Wits, just like fools, at war about a name,
Have full as oft no meaning, or the same.
Self-love and reason to one end aspire,
Pain their aversion, pleasure their desire;
But greedy that its object would devour,
90 This, taste the honey, and not wound the flow'r:
Pleasure, or wrong or rightly understood,
Our greatest evil or our greatest good.

Modes of self-love the passions we may call;
'Tis real good, or seeming, moves them all;
95 But since not every good we can divide,^o share
And reason bids us for our own provide,
Passions, though selfish, if their means be fair,
List^o under reason, and deserve her care; enlist
Those, that imparted,² court a nobler aim,
100 Exalt their kind, and take some virtue's name.

In lazy apathy let Stoics boast
Their virtue fixed; 'tis fixed as in a frost—
Contracted all, retiring to the breast;
But strength of mind is exercise, not rest:
105 The rising tempest puts in act the soul,
Parts it may ravage, but preserves the whole.
On life's vast ocean diversely we sail,
Reason the card,^o but passion is the gale; mariner's chart
Nor God alone in the still calm we find,
110 He mounts the storm, and walks upon the wind.

Passions, like elements, though born to fight,
Yet mixed and softened, in his^o work unite:³ God's schoolmen Experts in formal logic and theology, particularly as taught in universities.

Those, that imparted I.e., the passions, when imbued with reason.

Passions ... unite The four elements of the universe (earth, air, fire, and water) had been traditionally believed to correspond to four humors (melancholy, blood, choler, and phlegm), of which, in different proportions, all human constitutions were thought to be

These 'tis enough to temper and employ;
But what composes man, can man destroy?
115 Suffice that reason keep to Nature's road,
Subject, compound them, follow her and God.
Love, Hope, and Joy, fair pleasure's smiling train,
Hate, Fear, and Grief, the family of pain;
These, mixed with art, and to due bounds confined,
120 Make and maintain the balance of the mind—
The lights and shades, whose well accorded strife
Gives all the strength and colour of our life.

Pleasures are ever in our hands or eyes,
And when in act they cease, in prospect rise;
125 Present to grasp, and future still to find,
The whole employ of body and of mind.
All spread their charms, but charm not all alike;
On diff'rent senses diff'rent objects strike;
Hence diff'rent passions more or less inflame,
130 As strong or weak, the organs of the frame;⁴
And hence one master passion in the breast,
Like Aaron's serpent,⁵ swallows up the rest.

As man, perhaps, the moment of his breath,
Receives the lurking principle of death;
135 The young disease, that must subdue at length,
Grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength:⁶
So, cast and mingled with his very frame,
The mind's disease, its ruling passion, came;
Each vital humour, which should feed the whole,
140 Soon flows to this in body and in soul.
Whatever warms the heart or fills the head,
As the mind opens, and its functions spread,
Imagination plies her dang'rous art,
And pours it all upon the peccant⁷ part.
145 Nature its mother, habit is its nurse;
Wit, spirit, faculties but make it worse;
Reason itself but gives it edge and pow'r, formed. By the eighteenth century these notions were no longer taken as literal truth, but they retained their currency as metaphors.

Hence ... frame Different passions were thought to reside in and dominate different organs of the body.

¹ Aaron's serpent Exodus 7.10–12 relates the story of Aaron, who cast down his rod before the Pharaoh and turned it into a snake. The Egyptian magicians did the same, but Aaron's serpent devoured theirs.

⁶ As man ... strength It was believed that the origin of some diseases was communicated to the foetus in the womb.

⁷ peccant Diseased.

As Heav'n's blest beam turns vinegar more sour.

We, wretched subjects though to lawful sway

150 In this weak queen,¹ some fav'rite still obey.

Ah! if she lend not arms, as well as rules,

What can she more than tell us we are fools?

Teach us to mourn our nature, not to mend,

A sharp accuser, but a helpless^o friend! unhelpful

155 Or from a judge turn pleader, to persuade

The choice we make, or justify it made;

Proud of an easy conquest all along,

She but removes weak passions for the strong:

So, when small humors gather to a gout,²

160 The doctor fancies he has driv'n them out.

Yes, Nature's road must ever be preferred;

Reason is here no guide, but still a guard:

'Tis hers to rectify, not overthrow,

And treat this passion more as friend than foe.

165 A mightier pow'r the strong direction sends,

And sev'ral men impels to sev'ral ends;

Like varying winds, by other passions tossed,³

This drives them constant to a certain coast.

Let pow'r or knowledge, gold or glory, please,

170 Or (oft more strong than all) the love of ease;

Through life 'tis followed, ev'n at life's expense;

The merchant's toil, the sage's indolence,

The monk's humility, the hero's pride,

All, all alike, find reason on their side.

75 Th' eternal art,⁴ educing good from ill,

Grafts on this passion our best principle.

'Tis thus the mercury of man is fixed:

Strong grows the virtue with his nature mixed;

The dross^o cements what else were too refined, impurity

80 And in one interest body acts with mind.

As fruits ungrateful^o to the planter's care unresponsive

On savage stocks inserted learn to bear,⁵

The surest virtues thus from passions shoot,

Wild nature's vigor working at the root.

85 What crops of wit and honesty appear

¹ weak queen Reason.

² gout Thought to result from the body's attempt to rid itself of a redundancy of humors.

³ A mightier ... tossed I.e., God (the "mightier pow'r") ensures that there are people of various temperaments and inclinations to carry out the assorted tasks necessary to the world's work.

⁴ eternal art Providence.

⁵ fruits ... bear Grafts inserted in the stem of a wild plant.

From spleen, from obstinacy, hate, or fear!

See anger zeal and fortitude supply;

Ev'n av'rice, prudence; sloth, philosophy;

Lust, through some certain strainers well refined,

190 Is gentle love, and charms all womankind;

Envy, to which th' ignoble mind's a slave,

Is emulation in the learned or brave;

Nor virtue, male or female, can we name,

But what will grow on pride, or grow on shame.

195 Thus Nature gives us (let it check our pride)

The virtue nearest to our vice allied;

Reason the bias turns to good from ill,

And Nero reigns a Titus,⁶ if he will.

The fiery soul abhorred in Catiline,

200 In Decius charms, in Curtius⁷ is divine.

The same ambition can destroy or save,

And make a patriot as it makes a knave.

This light and darkness, in our chaos joined,
What shall divide? The God within the mind.⁸

205 Extremes in nature equal ends produce,

In man they join to some mysterious use;

Though each by turns the other's bound invade,

As, in some well-wrought picture, light and shade,

And oft so mix, the diff'rence is too nice^o subtle

210 Where ends the virtue, or begins the vice.

Fools! who from hence into the notion fall

That vice or virtue there is none at all.

If white and black blend, soften, and unite

A thousand ways, is there no black or white?

215 Ask your own heart, and nothing is so plain;

'Tis to mistake them costs the time and pain.

⁶ Nero Emperor of Rome who ordered his mother and sister murdered, and whose notorious cruelty and debauchery caused several revolts among his people, eventually leading him to commit suicide; Titus Celebrated as one of the most benevolent Roman emperors, he did much to alleviate the suffering and increase the happiness of his people. He is perhaps best known for the construction of the Roman Colosseum.

⁷ Decius Roman consul who died defending his army against the Goths; Curtius According to Livy, in 445 BCE lightning struck near the Roman Forum, creating a large chasm. After an oracle claimed that the hole could be closed by Rome's most precious possession, Marcus Curtius jumped into it, wearing full armor and riding a fine horse. The chasm closed immediately.

⁸ This light ... mind Cf. Genesis 1.4.

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
 As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
 Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
 220 We first endure, then pity, then embrace;
 But where th' extreme of vice, was ne'er agreed.
 Ask, "Where's the North?" At York, 'tis on the Tweed;¹
 In Scotland, at the Orcades;^o and there, Orkney Islands
 At Greenland, Zembla,² or the Lord knows where:
 225 No creature owns^o it in the first degree, admits to
 But thinks his neighbour farther gone than he—
 Ev'n those who dwell beneath its very zone,
 Or^o never feel the rage, or^o never own. either / or
 What happier natures shrink at with affright,
 230 The hard³ inhabitant contends is right.

Virtuous and vicious every man must be,
 Few in th' extreme, but all in the degree;
 The rogue and fool by fits is fair and wise,
 And ev'n the best, by fits, what they despise.
 235 'Tis but by parts we follow good or ill,
 For, vice or virtue, self directs it still;
 Each individual seeks a sev'ral^o goal, separate
 But Heav'n's great view is one, and that the whole
 That counter-works each folly and caprice;
 240 That disappoints th' effect of every vice
 That happy frailties to all ranks applied—
 Shame to the virgin, to the matron pride,
 Fear to the statesman, rashness to the chief,
 To kings presumption, and to crowds belief—
 245 That virtue's ends from vanity can raise,
 Which seeks no int'rest, no reward but praise;
 And build on wants, and on defects of mind,
 The joy, the peace, the glory of mankind.
 Heav'n forming each on other to depend,
 250 A master, or a servant, or a friend,
 Bids each on other for assistance call,
 'Till one man's weakness grows the strength of all.
 Wants, frailties, passions closer still ally
 The common int'rest, or endear the tie.
 255 To these we owe true friendship, love sincere,
 Each home-felt joy that life inherits here;

Tweed River in southern Scotland.

¹ Zembla Novaya Zemlya, an archipelago off the Arctic coast of Russia.

³ hard Hardened (i.e., to vice, as an inhabitant of the Arctic climate would be to the cold).

Yet from the same we learn, in its decline,
 Those joys, those loves, those int'rests to resign:
 Taught half by reason, half by mere decay,
 260 To welcome death, and calmly pass away.

Whate'er the passion, knowledge, fame, or pelf,^o wealth
 Not one will change his neighbor with himself.
 The learn'd is happy nature to explore,
 The fool is happy that he knows no more;
 265 The rich is happy in the plenty giv'n,
 The poor contents him with the care of heav'n.
 See the blind beggar dance, the cripple sing,
 The sot^o a hero, lunatic a king; drunkard
 The starving chemist^o in his golden views alchemist
 270 Supremely blest, the poet in his muse.

See some strange comfort every state attend,
 And pride bestowed on all, a common friend.
 See some fit passion every age supply;
 Hope travels through, nor quits us when we die.

275 Behold the child, by Nature's kindly law
 Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw;
 Some livelier plaything gives his youth delight,
 A little louder, but as empty quite:
 Scarves, garters,⁴ gold amuse his riper stage,
 280 And beads⁵ and prayer-books are the toys of age:
 Pleased with this bauble still, as that before,
 'Till tired he sleeps, and life's poor play is o'er!

Meanwhile, opinion gilds with varying rays
 Those painted clouds that beautify our days;
 285 Each want of happiness by hope supplied,
 And each vacuity of sense by pride.
 These build as fast as knowledge can destroy;
 In folly's cup still laughs the bubble, joy;
 One prospect lost, another still we gain,
 290 And not a vanity is giv'n in vain.
 Ev'n mean self-love becomes, by force divine,
 The scale to measure others' wants by thine.
 See! and confess, one comfort still must rise;
 'Tis this: though man's a fool, yet GOD IS WISE.
 —1733

⁴ Scarves Worn by Doctors of Divinity; garters Badges of the Knights of the Garter.

⁵ beads Rosaries.

*An Epistle from Mr. Pope to Dr. Arbuthnot*¹

*Neque sermonibus vulgi dederis te, nee in Praemiis humanis spem posueris rerum tuarum: suis te oportet illecebris ipsa Virtus trahat ad verum decus. Quid de te alii loquantur, ipsi videant, sed loquentur tamen.*²

TULLY [De Re Publica, Lib. VI, cap. XXIII].

ADVERTISEMENT

This paper is a sort of bill of complaint, begun many years since, and drawn up by snatches, as the several occasions offered. I had no thoughts of publishing it till it pleased some persons of rank and fortune (the authors of Verses to the Imitator of Horace, and of an Epistle to a Doctor of Divinity from a Nobleman at Hampton Court)³ to attack, in a very extraordinary manner, not only my writings (of which, being public, the public judge) but my person, morals, and family, whereof, to those who know me not, a truer information may be requisite. Being divided between the necessity to say something of myself, and my own laziness to undertake so awkward a task, I thought it the shortest way to put the last hand to this epistle. If it have anything pleasing, it will be that by which I am most desirous to please, the truth and the sentiment; and if anything offensive, it will be only to those I am least sorry to offend, the vicious or the ungenerous.

Many will know their own pictures in it, there being not a circumstance but what is true; but I have for the most part spared their names, and they may escape being laughed at if they please.

I would have some of them know, it was owing to the request of the learned and candid friend to whom it is inscribed that I make not as free use of theirs as they have done of mine. However, I shall have this advantage and honour on my side, that whereas, by their proceeding, any abuse may be directed at any man, no injury can possibly be done by mine, since a nameless character can never be found out but by its truth and likeness.

¹ Dr. Arbuthnot Formerly Queen Anne's physician, Arbuthnot was a close friend of Swift and a fellow member of the Scriblerus Club. Pope was spurred to complete this poem, which he had worked on intermittently for several years, when he learned that Arbuthnot was terminally ill. The poem, completed seven weeks before Arbuthnot's death, was, Pope declared, "the best memorial I can leave, both of my friendship to you, and to my character."

² Neque... tamen Latin: "You will neither give yourself to the gossip of the vulgar, nor place your hope in the rewards of men for the success of your affairs. Virtue herself, by her own allure, should lead you to true honor. What others may say of you, regard as their concern, for they will say it nevertheless." From De Re Publica 6.23, by Marcus Tullius Cicero ("Tully").

³ authors ... Court Lady Mary Wortley Montagu and John, Lord Hervey, respectively.

Shut, shut the door, good John!⁴ (fatigued I said)
Tie up the knocker, say I'm sick, I'm dead.
The Dog Star⁵ rages! nay 'tis past a doubt,
All Bedlam, or Parnassus,⁶ is let out:
Fire in each eye, and papers in each hand,
They rave, recite, and madden round the land.
What walls can guard me, or what shades can hide?
They pierce my thickets, through my grot⁷ they glide,
By land, by water, they renew the charge,
They stop the chariot, and they board the barge.⁸
No place is sacred, not the church is free,
Ev'n Sunday shines no Sabbath day to me:
Then from the Mint⁹ walks forth the man of rhyme,
Happy! to catch me just at dinner time.
Is there a parson, much bemused in beer,¹⁰
A maudlin poetess, a rhyming peer,⁹ member of the nobility
A clerk, foredoomed his father's soul to cross,

⁴ John John Serle, Pope's gardener and servant.

⁵ Dog Star Sirius, the brightest star in the constellation Canis Major. In late summer Sirius sets with the sun, and it is therefore associated with maddening heat. Late summer was also when poetry recitals were held in ancient Rome.

⁶ Bedlam The Hospital of St. Mary's of Bethlehem, a London hospital for the insane; Parnassus Mountain in Greece that, according to myth, was sacred to Apollo and the Muses, and was therefore seen as the home of artistic inspiration.

⁷ my grot On Pope's property in Twickenham an underground passage connected his house with his garden, which lay on the opposite side of the road. He decorated this passage and turned it into a beautiful grotto that functioned as a subterranean retreat.

⁸ board the barge Twickenham was on the Thames, enabling Pope to travel to London by barge.

⁹ the Mint Area in London that was a sanctuary for debtors—they could not be arrested while within its boundaries. Debtors could not be arrested anywhere on Sundays.

¹⁰ parson ... beer Probably a reference to Poet Laureate Laurence Eusden (the words "bemused in" play on his name), who was a parson and notorious for his heavy drinking.

Who pens a stanza when he should engross?¹
 Is there who, locked from ink and paper, scrawls
 20 With desp'rate charcoal round his darkened walls?
 All fly to Twit'nam^o and, in humble strain, Twickenham
 Apply to me to keep them mad or vain.
 Arthur,² whose giddy son neglects the laws,
 Imputes to me and my damned works the cause;
 25 Poor Cornus³ sees his frantic wife elope,
 And curses wit, and poetry, and Pope.

Friend to my life (which did not you prolong,
 The world had wanted many an idle song)
 What drop or nostrum^o can this plague remove? remedy
 30 Or which must end me, a fool's wrath or love?
 A dire dilemma! Either way I'm sped,^o dispatched, destroyed
 If foes, they write, if friends, they read me dead.
 Seized and tied down to judge, how wretched I!
 Who can't be silent, and who will not lie;
 35 To laugh were want of goodness and of grace,
 And to be grave exceeds all pow'r of face.
 I sit with sad civility, I read
 With honest anguish and an aching head,
 And drop at last, but in unwilling ears,
 40 This saving counsel, "Keep your piece nine years."⁴
 "Nine years!" cries he, who, high in Drury Lane,⁵ Lulled by soft zephyrs^o through the broken pane, breezes
 Rhymes ere he wakes, and prints before term⁶ ends,
 Obligated by hunger and request of friends:

45 "The piece you think is incorrect: why, take it;
 I'm all submission; what you'd have it, make it."

Three things another's modest wishes bound,
 My friendship, and a prologue, and ten pound.

¹ engross Write in legal form; write out legal documents.

² Arthur Arthur Moore, a business man and Member of Parliament whose son, James Moore Smythe, was a writer, and one Pope scorned. Pope later accused him of stealing lines from his Epistle to a Lady for use in a play.

³ Cornus From cornu, the Latin word for "horn," which was the emblem of the cuckold.

⁴ Keep ... years I.e., before publishing it. This advice is taken from Horace's Ars Poetica, line 388.

⁵ high in Drury Lane In a garret on Drury Lane, a street known for its theater but also for its squalid living quarters, which were home to many prostitutes and criminals.

⁶ term Period during which the law courts were in session. The publishing seasons coincided with these legal terms.

Pitholeon⁷ sends to me: "You know his Grace.
 50 I want a patron; ask him for a place."^o job
 Pitholeon libeled me—"but here's a letter
 Informs you, sir, 'twas when he knew no better.
 Dare you refuse him? Curll⁸ invites to dine;
 He'll write a Journal, or he'll turn divine."⁹
 55 Bless me! a packet.—"Tis a stranger sues,
 A virgin tragedy, an orphan muse."
 If I dislike it, "Furies, death, and rage!"
 If I approve, "Commend it to the stage."
 There (thank my stars) my whole commission ends;
 60 The play'rs and I are, luckily, no friends.
 Fired that the house^o reject him, "Sdeath, playhouse
 I'll print it
 And shame the fools—your int'rest, sir, with Lintot."¹⁰
 Lintot, dull rogue, will think your price too much.
 "Not, sir, if you revise it, and retouch."
 65 All my demurs but double his attacks;
 At last he whispers, "Do, and we go snacks."^o shares
 Glad of a quarrel, straight I clap the door,
 Sir, let me see your works and you no more.
 'Tis sung, when Midas' ears¹¹ began to spring
 70 (Midas, a sacred person and a king),
 His very minister, who spied them first,
 (Some say his queen) was forced to speak, or burst.

⁷ [Pope's note] The name taken from a foolish poet at Rhodes, who pretended much to Greek. [This was a reference to Leonard Welsted, mentioned again on line 375, with whom Pope had quarreled.]

⁸ Curll Edmund Curll, an unethical publisher who was notorious for publishing pirated, forged, and falsely ascribed works. He was one of Pope's primary adversaries and a frequent object of his attacks.

⁹ write ... divine I.e., he will attack Pope in an article in the London Journal or will write a theological treatise.

¹⁰ Lintot Bernard Lintot, the publisher who had issued Pope's early work, including his edition of Homer, but with whom Pope had since quarreled. Lintot, with Curll, figures in Pope's satire The Dunciad.

¹¹ Midas' ears King Midas of Lydia was given ass's ears by the god Apollo when he claimed to prefer Pan's rustic flute playing to the refined melodies of Apollo's lyre. Depending upon the version of the story, the secret of Midas's ears (which he hid under a turban) was first discovered by either the king's wife or his barber. The discoverer of the secret, unable to sleep, whispered the story either into a hole in the earth or a bed of reeds. Here Pope's references to the queen, minister, and king are allusions to Queen Caroline, first minister Robert Walpole, and King George II.

And is not mine, my friend, a sorer case,
 When every coxcomb^o perks them in my face? fool
 “Good friend, forbear! You deal in dang’rous things;
 I’d never name queens, ministers, or kings.
 Keep close to ears, and those let asses prick;
 ’Tis nothing”—Nothing? if they bite and kick?
 Out with it, Dunciad! Let the secret pass,
 That secret to each fool, that he’s an ass:
 The truth once told (and wherefore should we lie?)
 The Queen of Midas slept, and so may I.

You think this cruel? Take it for a rule,
 No creature smarts so little as a fool.
 Let peals of laughter, Codrus,¹ round thee break,
 Thou unconcerned canst hear the mighty crack.
 Pit, box, and gall’ry² in convulsions hurred,
 Thou stand’st unshook amidst a bursting world.
 Who shames a scribbler? Break one cobweb through,
 He spins the slight, self-pleasing thread anew:
 Destroy his fib or sophistry, in vain;
 The creature’s at his dirty work again;
 Throned in the centre of his thin designs,
 Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines.
 Whom have I hurt? Has poet yet, or peer,
 Lost the arched eyebrow or Parnassian sneer?
 And has not Colley³ still his lord and whore?
 His butchers Henley? his freemasons Moore?⁴
 Does not one table Bavius⁵ still admit?
 Still to one bishop Philips⁶ seem a wit?
 Still Sappho⁷—“Hold! for God’s sake—you’ll offend.
 No names—be calm—learn prudence of a friend:
 I too could write, and I am twice as tall,

Codrus Fictional poet ridiculed by both Virgil and Juvenal.

² Pit, box, and gall’ry Sections of the theater.

³ Colley Colley Cibber, Poet Laureate, who figured as King of the Dunces in the new edition of Pope’s Dunciad.

⁴ Henley John Henley was an independent preacher who gave sensational orations on a variety of matters, both theological and mundane, for which he charged a shilling for admission. His oratory was set up in one of London’s primary meat markets, and in 1729 he had given a sermon that claimed to trace the religious history and use of the butcher’s calling; Moore James Moore Smythe, who was a freemason.

⁵ Bavius Poet who attacked Virgil and Horace.

⁶ Philips Ambrose Philips, a rival poet who served as secretary to Hugh Boulter, Archbishop of Armagh.

⁷ Sappho Famous lyric poet of ancient Greece; also, Pope’s poetic nickname for Lady Montagu.

But foes like these!”—One flatt’rer’s worse than all;
 Of all mad creatures, if the learn’d are right,
 It is the slaver kills, and not the bite.
 A fool quite angry is quite innocent;
 Alas! ’tis ten times worse when they repent.

One dedicates in high heroic prose,
 And ridicules beyond a hundred foes;
 One from all Grub Street⁸ will my fame defend,
 And, more abusive, calls himself my friend.
 This prints my letters,⁹ that expects a bribe,
 And others roar aloud, “Subscribe, subscribe.”¹⁰

There are, who to my person pay their court:
 I cough like Horace, and though lean, am short;
 Ammon’s great son¹¹ one shoulder had too high,
 Such Ovid’s nose,¹² and “Sir! you have an eye—”
 Go on, obliging creatures, make me see
 All that disgraced my betters, met in me.
 Say for my comfort, languishing in bed,
 “Just so immortal Maro^o held his head”;
 And when I die, be sure you let me know
 Great Homer died three thousand years ago.

Virgil

Why did I write? What sin to me unknown
 Dipped me in ink, my parents’, or my own?
 As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame,
 I lipped in numbers,^o for the numbers came. meter
 I left no calling for this idle trade,
 No duty broke, no father disobeyed.
 The muse but served to ease some friend, not wife,
 To help me through this long disease, my life,
 To second, Arbuthnot! thy art and care,
 And teach the being you preserved, to bear.^o endure

But why then publish? Granville the polite,
 And knowing Walsh, would tell me I could write;
 Well-natured Garth inflamed with early praise,
 And Congreve loved, and Swift endured my lays;^o verses

⁸ Grub Street Collective term for literary hack writers, taken from the street in London of that name, where many such writers lived.

⁹ prints my letters Curll published an unauthorized version of Pope’s letters in 1726.

¹⁰ subscribe Books were sometimes printed by subscription.

¹¹ Ammon’s great son Alexander the Great.

¹² Ovid’s nose Ovid’s family name was Naso (from the Latin meaning “nose”).

140 The courtly Talbot, Somers, Sheffield read,
 Ev'n mitred Rochester would nod the head,
 And St. John's self (great Dryden's friends before)
 With open arms received one poet more.¹
 Happy my studies, when by these approved!
 Happier their author, when by these below'd!
 145 From these the world will judge of men and books,
 Not from the Burnets, Oldmixons, and Cookes.²

Soft were my numbers; who could take offence
 While pure description held the place of sense?
 Like gentle Fanny's³ was my flow'ry theme,
 150 A painted mistress, or a purling stream.
 Yet then did Gildon⁴ draw his venal quill;
 I wished the man a dinner, and sat still.
 Yet then did Dennis⁵ rave in furious fret;
 I never answered, I was not in debt.
 155 If want provoked, or madness made them print,
 I waged no war with Bedlam or the Mint.

Did some more sober critic come abroad?
 If wrong, I smiled; if right, I kissed the rod.⁶
 Pains, reading, study are their just pretence,
 160 And all they want is spirit, taste, and sense.
 Commas and points they set exactly right,
 And 'twere a sin to rob them of their mite.⁷

Granville ... more This list of men—intended to establish Pope as a preeminent poet and Dryden's successor—names friends and supporters of Dryden who had also encouraged the young Pope. George Granville, William Walsh, and Sir Samuel Garth were all poets of note; William Congreve was a playwright; Charles Talbot, Duke of Shrewsbury; Lord Somers; and John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, were all statesmen and patrons. Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, and Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke, were both close friends of Pope.

² Burnets, Oldmixons, and Cookes Three writers who had attacked Pope in print. In his note Pope calls them "authors of secret and scandalous history."

³ Fanny Lord Fanny was one of Pope's nicknames for John, Lord Hervey, a favorite of the Queen and a known bisexual whose effeminate manner and appearance were frequently commented upon.

Gildon Charles Gildon, a critic and writer who had occasionally condemned Pope's writing, at the instigation (Pope believed) of Joseph Addison, one of Pope's rivals; it is for this reason that Pope accuses Gildon of having a corrupt, or mercenary, pen.

⁵ Dennis John Dennis, another critic who had attacked Pope, though only after Pope had mocked him in his Essay on Criticism.

⁶ kissed the rod Accepted the criticism.

⁷ mite Very small or insignificant amount of money.

Yet ne'er one sprig of laurel⁸ graced these ribalds,⁹ abusive rascals
 From slashing Bentley down to piddling Tibbalds.⁹
 165 Each wight¹⁰ who reads not, and but scans and spells,
 Each word-catcher that lives on syllables,
 Ev'n such small critics some regard may claim,
 Preserved in Milton's or in Shakespeare's name.
 Pretty! in amber to observe the forms
 170 Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms;
 The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,
 But wonder how the devil they got there?
 Were others angry? I excused them too;
 Well might they rage; I gave them but their due.
 175 A man's true merit 'tis not hard to find,
 But each man's secret standard in his mind.
 That casting weight¹¹ pride adds to emptiness,
 This, who can gratify? for who can guess?
 The bard¹² whom pilfered pastorals renown,
 180 Who turns a Persian tale for half a crown,¹³
 Just writes to make his barrenness appear,
 And strains from hard-bound brains eight lines a year:
 He who, still wanting though he lives on theft,
 Steals much, spends little, yet has nothing left;
 185 And he who now to sense, now nonsense leaning,
 Means not, but blunders round about a meaning;
 And he whose fustian's¹⁴ so sublimely bad,
 It is not poetry, but prose run mad:
 All these, my modest satire bade translate,

⁸ laurel Wreaths of laurel (sacred to Apollo) were used to crown celebrated poets in ancient Greece and Rome.

⁹ Bentley Richard Bentley, a great classical scholar who, however, earned ridicule for his edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, in which he arbitrarily placed in square brackets numerous passages that he felt were not up to Milton's standard, claiming they must have been slipped in by an amanuensis, without the blind poet's knowledge; Tibbalds Lewis Theobald, a scholar who used his expertise in Elizabethan literature to expose errors in Pope's edition of Shakespeare.

¹⁰ wight Human being (usually a contemptuous or belittling term).

¹¹ casting weight Weight that tips the scale one way or the other; deciding factor.

¹² bard Ambrose Philips, part of whose Fifth Pastoral Pope claimed was plagiarized from the work of an Italian poet. Philips had also published Persian Tales, a book of translated stories.

¹³ half a crown The fee usually charged by a prostitute.

¹⁴ fustian Inflated, lofty, and pompous language.

And owned that nine such poets made a Tate.¹
How did they fume, and stamp, and roar, and chafe!
And swear, not Addison himself was safe.

Peace to all such! But were there one² whose fires
True genius kindles, and fair fame inspires,
Blessed with each talent and each art to please,
And born to write, converse, and live with ease:
Should such a man, too fond to rule alone,
Bear, like the Turk,³ no brother near the throne;
View him with scornful, yet with jealous eyes,
And hate for arts that caused himself to rise;
Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer;
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike;
Alike reserved to blame or to commend,
A tim'rous foe, and a suspicious friend;
Dreading ev'n fools; by flatterers besieged,
And so obliging that he ne'er obliged;
Like Cato, give his little senate laws,⁴
And sit attentive to his own applause;
While wits and templars⁵ every sentence raise,
And wonder with a foolish face of praise.
Who but must laugh, if such a man there be?
Who would not weep, if Atticus were he!

nine... Tate Nahum Tate, poet and dramatist, was poet laureate from 1692 to 1715. He was best known for his rewriting of Shakespeare's King Lear, in which he provided a happy ending. Pope is here playing on the expression "It takes nine tailors to make a man."

² one Joseph Addison, whose writing and wit Pope admired, but with whom Pope had quarreled after he discovered Addison had been behind a plot to discredit his edition of Homer's Iliad. His satirical nickname for Addison here, as elsewhere, is Atticus, after the Roman philosopher of that name, who was a friend of Cicero and a man renowned for his wisdom, generosity, and love of truth.

³ like the Turk It was a popular stereotype at the time that Turkish monarchs would murder any kinsmen, particularly brothers, who could become rivals to the throne.

Cato... laws Addison had written an immensely popular tragedy about Cato, the virtuous Roman senator who chose to commit suicide rather than submit to Caesar's tyrannical authority, for which Pope had composed the prologue. This line, which satirically echoes one from that prologue, mocks the "little senate" of fellow Whig writers over whom Addison ruled during regular meetings at Button's Coffee House.

templars Law students or young lawyers, some of whom had literary aspirations.

215 What though my name stood rubric⁶ written in red on the walls?

Or plastered posts, with claps,⁶ in capitals?⁶ placards
Or smoking forth,⁷ a hundred hawkers'⁶ load, street vendors'
On wings of winds came flying all abroad?
I sought no homage from the race that write;
220 I kept, like Asian monarchs, from their sight:
Poems I heeded (now berhymed so long)
No more than thou, great George! a birthday song.⁸
I ne'er with wits or witlings passed my days
To spread about the itch of verse and praise;
225 Nor like a puppy daggled⁹ through the town traipsed, taken
To fetch and carry sing-song up and down;
Nor at rehearsals sweat, and mouthed, and cried,
With handkerchief and orange⁹ at my side;
But sick of fops, and poetry, and prate,
230 To Bufo left the whole Castalian¹⁰ state.

Proud as Apollo on his forked hill,
Sat full-blown Bufo, puffed by every quill;
Fed with soft dedication all day long,
Horace and he went hand in hand in song.
235 His library (where busts of poets dead,
And a true Pindar, stood without a head)¹¹
Received of wits an undistinguished race,
Who first his judgment asked, and then a place:
Much they extolled his pictures, much his seat,¹² estate
240 And flattered every day, and some days eat;¹² ate
Till grown more frugal in his riper days,
He paid some bards with port, and some with praise;
To some a dry rehearsal¹² was assigned,

⁶ What though ... capitals Allusions to publishers' methods of advertising new books.

⁷ smoking forth I.e., hot off the press.

⁸ great George ... song Each year the Poet Laureate was required to compose a birthday ode for the monarch.

⁹ orange Oranges were commonly sold in theaters.

¹⁰ Bufo Latin for "toad"; Bufo is the name given to a certain type of vain, tasteless, and self-absorbed patron; Castalian Castalia was the spring on Mount Parnassus that was sacred to Apollo and the Muses. It ran between the two peaks of the mountain (the "forked hill" of line 231), one of which was sacred to Apollo, the other to Bacchus.

¹¹ busts ... head Pope is mocking those who displayed headless busts and claim them to belong to statues of great poets.

¹² dry rehearsal Recitation of poetry that was not rewarded with alcohol.

And others (harder still) he paid in kind.¹
 245 Dryden alone (what wonder?) came not nigh,
 Dryden alone escaped this judging eye:
 But still the great have kindness in reserve;
 He helped to bury whom he helped to starve.²
 May some choice patron bless each gray goose quill!
 250 May every Bavius have his Bufo still!
 So when a statesman wants a day's defence,
 Or envy holds a whole week's war with sense,
 Or simple pride for flatt'ry makes demands,
 May dunce by dunce be whistled off my hands!
 255 Blessed be the great! for those they take away,
 And those they left me—for they left me Gay;³
 Left me to see neglected genius bloom,
 Neglected die, and tell it on his tomb;
 Of all thy blameless life the sole return
 260 My verse, and Queensb'ry weeping o'er thy urn!
 Oh let me live my own, and die so too!
 ("To live and die is all I have to do");⁴
 Maintain a poet's dignity and ease,
 And see what friends, and read what books I please;
 265 Above a patron, though I condescend
 Sometimes to call a minister my friend.
 I was not born for courts or great affairs;
 I pay my debts, believe, and say my prayers,
 Can sleep without a poem in my head,
 270 Nor know if Dennis be alive or dead.
 Why am I asked what next shall see the light?
 Heav'ns! was I born for nothing but to write?
 Has life no joys for me? or (to be grave)
 Have I no friend to serve, no soul to save?
 275 "I found him close with Swift"—"Indeed? No doubt"
 (Cries prating Balbus⁵) "something will come out."
 'Tis all in vain, deny it as I will.
 "No, such a genius never can lie still,"

¹ paid in kind I.e., Bufo paid them by reciting his own poetry.

² [Pope's note] Mr. Dryden, after having lived in exigencies, had a magnificent funeral bestowed upon him by the contributions of several persons of quality.

³ Gay John Gay, a close friend of Pope, Swift, and Addison and a fellow member of the Scriblerus Club. Though Gay was the author of several popular works, including The Beggar's Opera, he failed to win patronage until, toward the end of his life, he was taken under the protection of the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry.

To live ... do Line 94 of John Denham's Of Prudence.

⁵ Balbus Latin: Stammering.

And then for mine obligingly mistakes
 280 The first lampoon Sir Will or Bubo⁶ makes.
 Poor guiltless I! and can I choose but smile,
 When every coxcomb knows me by my style?
 Cursed be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
 That tends to make one worthy man my foe,
 285 Give virtue scandal, innocence a fear,
 Or from the soft-eyed virgin steal a tear!
 But he who hurts a harmless neighbour's peace,
 Insults fall'n worth, or beauty in distress,
 Who loves a lie, lame slander helps about,
 290 Who writes a libel, or who copies out:
 That fop whose pride affects a patron's name,
 Yet absent, wounds an author's honest fame;
 Who can your merit selfishly approve,
 And show the sense of it without the love;
 295 Who has the vanity to call you friend,
 Yet wants the honour, injured, to defend;
 Who tells whate'er you think, whate'er you say,
 And, if he lie not, must at least betray:
 Who to the Dean and silver bell can swear,
 300 And sees at Cannons what was never there:⁷
 Who reads but with a lust to misapply,
 Make satire a lampoon, and fiction lie.
 A lash like mine no honest man shall dread,
 But all such babbling blockheads in his stead.
 305 Let Sporus⁸ tremble—"What? that thing of silk,
 Sporus, that mere white curd of ass's milk?
 Satire or sense, alas! can Sporus feel?
 Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel?"⁹
 Yet let me flap this bug with gilded wings,
 310 This painted¹⁰ child of dirt, that stinks and stings;

⁶ Sir Will or Bubo Sir William Yonge, a minor poet and political pawn of Walpole, and Bubb Dodington, a wealthy, extravagant, and corrupt politician who made a show of being a patron of the arts.

⁷ Who ... there In Pope's Epistle to Burlington, his description of Timon's villa was mistaken (perhaps intentionally) for a satire of Cannons, the estate of the Duke of Chandos. The description of Timon's villa, unlike the real Cannons, had a chapel with a silver bell and a Dean.

⁸ Sporus Sporus was a boy whom Roman Emperor Nero favored. He had him castrated and then married him in a large, public ceremony. Here Sporus is meant to represent Lord Hervey, a favorite of the Queen and a man whose effeminate manners and appearance were frequently commented upon.

⁹ wheel I.e., of torture.

¹⁰ painted Lord Hervey was known to wear makeup.

Whose buzz the witty and the fair annoys,
 Yet wit ne'er tastes, and beauty ne'er enjoys;
 So well-bred spaniels civilly delight
 In mumbling of the game they dare not bite.
 Eternal smiles his emptiness betray,
 As shallow streams run dimpling all the way.
 Whether in florid impotence he speaks,
 And, as the prompter¹ breathes, the puppet squeaks;
 Or at the ear of Eve,² familiar toad,
 Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad,
 In puns, or politics, or tales, or lies,
 Or spite, or smut, or rhymes, or blasphemies.
 His wit all seesaw between that and this,
 Now high, now low, now master up, now miss,
 And he himself one vile antithesis.
 Amphibious thing! that acting either part,
 The trifling head or the corrupted heart,
 Fop at the toilet,³ flatt'rer at the board,³ dressing table
 Now trips a lady, and now struts a lord.
 Eve's tempter thus the rabbins⁴ have expressed, rabbis
 A cherub's face, a reptile all the rest;
 Beauty that shocks you, parts that none will trust,
 Wit that can creep, and pride that licks the dust.

Not fortune's worshipper, nor fashion's fool,
 Not lucre's madman, nor ambition's tool,
 Not proud, nor servile, be one poet's praise
 That, if he pleased, he pleased by many ways:
 That flatt'ry, even to kings, he held a shame,
 And thought a lie in verse or prose the same:
 That not in fancy's maze he wandered long,
 But stooped⁴ to truth, and moralized his song:
 That not for fame, but virtue's better end,
 He stood⁵ the furious foe, the timid friend, withstood
 The damning critic, half-approving wit,
 The coxcomb hit, or fearing to be hit;
 Laughed at the loss of friends he never had,
 The dull, the proud, the wicked, and the mad;
 The distant threats of vengeance on his head,
 The blow unfelt, the tear he never shed;
 The tale revived, the lie so oft o'erthrown,
 Th' imputed trash, and dullness not his own;

¹ the prompter Walpole.

² Eve Queen Caroline. Cf. Milton's Paradise Lost, 4.799, in which the devil is described in this position.

³ board Dining table.

⁴ stooped Swooped, as a falcon does when it catches sight of its prey.

The morals blackened when the writings 'scape,
 The libeled person, and the pictured shape;⁵
 Abuse on all he loved, or loved him, spread,
 A friend in exile, or a father dead;
 The whisper that to greatness still too near,
 Perhaps yet vibrates on his Sovereign's ear—
 Welcome for thee, fair virtue! all the past:
 For thee, fair virtue! welcome ev'n the last!
 "But why insult the poor, affront the great?"
 A knave's a knave, to me, in every state;
 Alike my scorn, if he succeed or fail,
 Sporus at court, or Japhet⁶ in a jail,
 A hireling scribbler, or a hireling peer,
 Knight of the Post corrupt, or of the Shire,⁷
 If on a pillory, or near a throne,
 He gain his prince's ear, or lose his own.
 Yet soft by nature, more a dupe than wit,
 Sappho can tell you how this man was bit:⁸
 This dreaded sat'rist Dennis will confess
 Foe to his pride, but friend to his distress:⁹
 So humble, he has knocked at Tibbald's door,
 Has drunk with Cibber, nay has rhymed for Moore.
 Full ten years slandered, did he once reply?
 Three thousand suns went down on Welsted's lie.¹⁰
 To please a mistress one aspersed his life;
 He lashed him not, but let her be his wife.
 Let Budgell charge low Grub Street on his quill,

⁵ the pictured shape Some caricatures of Pope showed him as a hunchbacked ape.

⁶ Japhet Japhet Crook, a notorious forger who obtained several thousand pounds and two estates through forged deeds and wills before he was discovered, whereupon he was placed in the pillory, his ears were cut off, and he was locked in prison.

⁷ Knight ... Shire A Knight of the Post made a living by giving false evidence; a Knight of the Shire represented his county in Parliament.

⁸ bit Deceived.

⁹ Dennis ... distress Near the end of his life Dennis fell into debt. In addition to publicly supporting Dennis's works, Pope helped to organize a benefit performance in his honor and contributed a prologue to the play that was performed.

¹⁰ Welsted's lie Leonard Welsted, who, according to Pope, claimed Pope had "occasioned a lady's death." Welsted was also one of those who maintained that Pope's Epistle to Burlington satirized the Duke of Chandos.

And write whate'er he pleased, except his will;¹
 380 Let the two Curlls of town and court² abuse
 His father, mother, body, soul, and muse.
 Yet why? that father held it for a rule
 It was a sin to call our neighbour fool;
 That harmless mother thought no wife a whore—
 385 Hear this, and spare his family, James More!
 Unspotted names, and memorable long,
 If there be force in virtue, or in song.
 Of gentle blood (part shed in honour's cause,
 While yet in Britain honour had applause)
 390 Each parent sprung—"What fortune, pray?"—Their own,
 And better got than Bestia's³ from the throne.
 Born to no pride, inheriting no strife,
 Nor marrying discord in a noble wife,
 Stranger to civil and religious rage,
 395 The good man walked innoxious⁴ through doing no harm
 his age.
 No courts he saw, no suits would ever try,
 Nor dared an oath,⁴ nor hazarded a lie.
 Unlearned, he knew no schoolman's subtle art,
 No language but the language of the heart.

400 By nature honest, by experience wise,
 Healthy by temp'rance and by exercise;
 His life, though long, to sickness passed unknown;
 His death was instant, and without a groan.
 Oh grant me thus to live, and thus to die!
 405 Who sprung from kings shall know less joy than I.
 O friend! may each domestic bliss be thine!
 Be no unpleasing melancholy mine:
 Me, let the tender office long engage
 To rock the cradle of reposing age,
 410 With lenient^o arts extend a mother's breath, soothing
 Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death,
 Explore the thought, explain the asking eye,
 And keep a while one parent from the sky!
 On cares like these if length of days attend,
 415 May Heav'n, to bless those days, preserve my friend,
 Preserve him social, cheerful, and serene,
 And just as rich as when he served a Queen!
 Whether that blessing be denied, or giv'n,
 Thus far was right—the rest belongs to Heav'n.
 —1735 (WRITTEN 1731–34)

¹ Budgell ... will An article in the Grub Street Journal accused Eustace Budgell of forging the will of Matthew Tindal. Budgell believed (wrongly) that Pope had written the article.

² two Curlls ... court The Curll of the court is Lord Hervey; the other is Edmund Curll, the publisher.

³ Bestia Corrupt Roman politician of the second century BCE. Here the name is probably meant to signify the Duke of Marlborough, who became rich by winning the favor of Queen Anne.

⁴ dared an oath Pope's father refused both to renounce his Catholicism and to take oaths against the Pope. As a result, he was denied many of the rights of citizenship, including the rights to vote, attend schools, and inherit property.

LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU

1689 – 1762

In keeping with expectations for women of her station, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu never published under her own name, but was nonetheless one of the most celebrated and admired female writers of her age. She is known today mainly for her letters, but wrote in a variety of genres, including poetry, fiction, and essays. Twentieth-century feminist literary critics have recovered and explored Montagu's writings on female sexual desire, gender relations, and her feminist critique of marriage. Unconventional, erudite, and independent, she referred to herself as "a sister of the quill."

Montagu was born Mary Pierrepont in London in 1689; her father, the Whig Evelyn Pierrepont, became an earl when she was one year old. At three years of age she lost her mother (born Lady Mary Fielding), whom she later imagined to have been a model of female forbearance at the hands of a libertine husband. The eldest of four children, in her youth Mary was surrounded by some of the leading figures of the London literary scene, including Joseph Addison, Richard Steele, and William Congreve. She also formed close friendships in her teenage years with a circle of upper- and middle-class literary women. As was standard for a young woman of her social and economic position, she was trained by a governess in the conventional accomplishments of a lady's curriculum, but Montagu's intellectual ambitions were broader. She duly embarked on a secret, self-directed education in Latin in her father's study; everyone around her assumed she was locked away reading novels. In 1712 she eloped with Edward Wortley Montagu, a Whig Member of Parliament, against the wishes of her father, who had intended her for another suitor to whom she objected. The couple had two children. In late 1715 Montagu barely survived a serious bout of smallpox. The disease had killed her only brother a few years earlier, and it left her severely scarred. Less than a year after her recovery she left for Constantinople with her husband, who had been appointed British Ambassador to Turkey.

Montagu's most memorable writing grew out of her experiences in what was then the Ottoman Empire. Fascinated by the cultures of Islamic Europe, Turkey, and the Mediterranean, she was an observant and sensitive traveler, and her letters home—to her sister, to Alexander Pope, and others—show the range of her curiosity, and include descriptions and insights into everyday life, religious issues, and literary matters. At Sofia in Bulgaria she visited the famed women's public baths, which she describes with a frankness and admiration unusual for a western visitor. Upon her return to England she edited and compiled what she called her Embassy Letters for publication after her death.

Montagu's sojourn in Turkey had a lasting impact not only in the world of letters but also in the field of public health. Having narrowly escaped death by smallpox herself, Montagu had her five-year-old son inoculated against the disease at Constantinople. Later, in 1721, the first inoculation in England was performed on her three-year-old daughter, and Montagu became a strong advocate of a procedure that was treated with great prejudice and suspicion by the English medical establishment. She was heavily criticized for promoting the practice, and she published "A Plain Account of Inoculating the Smallpox" (1722), in which she castigates the medical profession for its blind self-interest, pseudonymously in a newspaper.

Montagu's "Six Town Eclogues," written in 1715 and 1716, have been widely admired. The poems (some of which were attributed to Pope and Gay) are biting, satirical, and studded with references to actual persons and their intrigues. Each of this series of six poems is written not in a rustic voice (as is traditional in the eclogue) but in that of a member or members of London "society." Among Montagu's many epistolary poems, the "Epistle from Mrs. Yonge to Her Husband" is the complaint of a divorced wife whose philandering husband profits financially from the dissolution of the marriage.

Other significant writings include her essay #573 of Addison and Steele's Spectator (she was the only female contributor, and remained anonymous), and her own political periodical, The Nonsense of Common-Sense (1737–38). Montagu's learning, outspokenness, and refusal to conform to the conventions of "female" behavior made her an easy target in a male-dominated literary scene. Beginning in 1728, Alexander Pope, her former correspondent, admirer, and occasional collaborator, launched a smear campaign against Montagu, the exact reasons for which remain unclear. Montagu responded to these attacks by ridiculing Pope's appearance, intellectual abilities, and writing. Their quarrel, all of it carried on in print, lasted on his side until after she left England.

In the 1730s the Montagus' marriage began to fail. In 1736 Montagu fell in love with the much younger bisexual Italian writer Francesco Algarotti, and launched an ardent epistolary relationship with him that lasted for five years. In 1739 she left London to reside in Italy, secretly intending to live with Algarotti. In Venice she conducted a salon, a regular social gathering of Venetian nobility, intelligentsia, and visiting luminaries. For the last twenty-five years of her life she lived mainly in Italy, but conducted various travels in Europe, including a kind of Grand Tour (traditionally a rite reserved for upper-class young men) in the early 1740s.

Near the end of her life Montagu returned to England. Back in London she received many visits by people who regarded her as a kind of living legend, a well-traveled woman of letters who had never refrained from asserting her own voice, nor from conducting herself according to her own rules. Her later prose writings, chiefly letters and fiction, are at last beginning to receive critical attention. She died of breast cancer in London in 1762 and was buried in Grosvenor Chapel in Hanover Square.

*Saturday;
The Small Pox¹*

Flavia

The wretched Flavia on her couch reclined,
Thus breathed the anguish of a wounded mind.
A glass reversed in her right hand she bore,
For now she shunned the face she sought before.
How am I changed! Alas, how am I grown
A frightful spectre, to myself unknown!
Where's my complexion, where the radiant bloom
That promised happiness for years to come?
Then, with what pleasure I this face surveyed!

- 10 To look once more, my visits oft delayed!
Charmed with the view, a fresher red would rise,
And a new life shot sparkling from my eyes.
Ah, faithless glass, my wonted^o bloom accustomed restore!
Alas, I rave! That bloom is now no more!
15 The greatest good the gods on men bestow,
Ev'n youth itself to me is useless now.
There was a time (Oh, that I could forget!)
When opera tickets poured before my feet,
And at the Ring,² where brightest beauties shine,
20 The earliest cherries of the park were mine.

¹ the Ring West Carriage Drive, a circular drive that divides Hyde Park from Kensington Gardens. The most fashionable members of society would drive around the Ring, displaying themselves in their coaches.

¹ Saturday ... Pox From Six Town Eclogues.

Witness, oh Lilly!¹ And thou, Motteux,² tell
How much Japan³ these eyes have made you sell!
With what contempt you saw me oft despise
The humble offer of the raffled prize.

For at each raffle still the prize I bore,
With scorn rejected, or with triumph wore.
Now beauty's fled, and presents are no more.

For me, the patriot has the house⁴ forsook,
And left debates to catch a passing look;
For me, the soldier has soft verses writ;
For me, the beau has aimed to be a wit;
For me, the wit to nonsense was betrayed;
The gamester⁵ has for me his dun delayed gambler
And overseen the card I would have paid.⁵

The bold and haughty, by success made vain,
Awed by my eyes has trembled to complain.
The bashful squire, touched with a wish unknown,
Has dared to speak with spirit not his own.
Fired by one wish, all did alike adore;
Now beauty's fled, and lovers are no more.

As round the room I turn my weeping eyes,
New unaffected scenes of sorrow rise.
Far from my sight that killing picture bear,
The face disfigure, or the canvas tear!
That picture, which with pride I used to show,
The lost resemblance but upbraids me now.
And thou, my toilette, where I oft have sate,
While hours unheeded passed in deep debate
How curls should fall, or where a patch⁶ to place,
If blue or scarlet best became my face,

¹ Lilly Charles Lillie, a celebrated perfumer and seller of snuff who owned a shop in the Strand. Lillie was also a printer of The Tatler and The Spectator.

² Motteux Peter Anthony Motteux, who described himself in a letter to the Spectator No. 288 as "an author turned dealer." Motteux was a former playwright and translator who went into business, establishing an East India warehouse in London, from which he sold tea, fabrics, china, fans, and other Indian and Chinese goods.

³ Japan Word used loosely to refer to several common products of Japan at the time, including Japanese porcelain and silk.

⁴ house House of Parliament.

⁵ gamester... paid Rather than immediately demanding the money due to him (his dun), the gambler was underwriting Flavia's next bet.

⁶ patch Piece of silk or plaster, cut in various ornamental shapes (stars, half-moons, etc.), and put on the face either to hide a scar or imperfection, or simply as decoration.

Now on some happier nymph^o thy aid bestow. maiden
On fairer heads, ye useless jewels, glow!
No borrowed lustre can my charms restore;
Beauty is fled, and dress⁷ is now no more.

Ye meaner beauties, I permit you, shine;
Go triumph in the hearts that once were mine.
But 'midst your triumphs, with confusion know
'Tis to my ruin all your charms ye owe.
Would pitying heav'n restore my wonted mien,⁸
You still might move unthought of and unseen—
But oh, how vain, how wretched is the boast
Of beauty faded and of Empire lost!
What now is left but weeping to deplore
My beauty fled and Empire now no more!

Ye cruel chemists, what withheld your aid?
Could no pomatums⁹ save a trembling maid?
How false and trifling is that art you boast;
No art can give me back my beauty lost!
In tears surrounded by my friends I lay,
Masked o'er and trembling at the light of day.
Mirmillo¹⁰ came, my fortune to deplore
(A golden headed cane, well carried, he bore);
Cordials, he cried, my spirits must restore—
Beauty is fled, and spirit is no more!
Galen the Grave, officious Squirt,¹¹ was there
With fruitless grief and unavailing care;
Machaon¹² too, the great Machaon, known
By his red cloak and his superior frown.
"And why," he cried, "this grief and this despair?
You shall again be well, again be fair,
Believe my oath" (with that an oath he swore)
False was his oath! My beauty is no more.

Cease, hapless maid; no more thy tale pursue,
Forsake mankind and bid the world adieu.

⁷ dress Act of adorning oneself.

⁸ mien Expression or appearance of the face.

⁹ pomatums Pomades, scented ointments for the skin.

¹⁰ Mirmillo Sir Hans Sloane, a distinguished physician and the president of the Royal Society from 1727 to 1741.

¹¹ Galen the Grave Galen was John Gay's nickname for Dr. John Woodward, a natural historian, geologist, and physician whose work The State of Physic and of Diseases (1718) condemned the popular treatment of smallpox; Squirt Character in Samuel Garth's famous poem The Dispensary (1699), often referred to as "officious Squirt."

¹² Machaon Hero of The Dispensary; here Garth, Lady Mary's family doctor.

85 Monarchs and beauties rule with equal sway;
 All strive to serve, and glory to obey.
 Alike unpitied when deposed they grow,
 Men mock the idol of their former vow.
 Adieu, ye parks in some obscure recess,
 90 Where gentle streams will weep at my distress,
 Where no false friend will in my grief take part,
 And mourn my ruin with a joyful heart.
 There let me live in some deserted place,
 There hide in shades this lost, inglorious face.
 95 Ye operas, circles, I no more must view!
 My toilette, patches, all the world, adieu!
 —1716

*The Reasons that Induced Dr. S. to Write a Poem Called The Lady's Dressing Room*¹

The Doctor in a clean starched band,^o clerical collar
 His golden snuff box in his hand,
 With care his diamond ring displays
 And artful shows its various rays,
 5 While grave he stalks down—Street,
 His dearest Betty—to meet.
 Long had he waited for this hour,
 Nor gained admittance to the bow'r,
 Had joked and punned, and swore and writ,
 10 Tried all his gallantry and wit,
 Had told her oft what part he bore
 In Oxford's schemes in days of yore,
 But bawdy,^o politics, nor satire lewd talk
 Could move this dull hard-hearted creature.
 15 Jenny, her maid, could taste^o a rhyme appreciate
 And, grieved to see him lose his time,
 Had kindly whispered in his ear,
 "For twice two pound you enter here;
 My lady vows without that sum
 20 It is in vain you write or come."
 The destined off ring now he brought
 And, in a paradise of thought,
 With a low bow approached the dame,
 Who smiling heard him preach his flame.
 25 His gold she takes (such proofs as these Convince most unbelieving shes)

 And in her trunk rose up to lock it (Too wise to trust it in her pocket)
 And then, returned with blushing grace,
 30 Expects the doctor's warm embrace.
 But now this is the proper place
 Where morals stare me in the face,
 And for the sake of fine expression
 I'm forced to make a small digression.
 35 Alas, for wretched humankind,
 With learning mad, with wisdom blind!
 The ox thinks he's for saddle fit
 (As long ago friend Horace writ²)
 And men their talents still mistaking,
 40 The stutterer fancies his is speaking.
 With admiration oft we see
 Hard features heightened by toupee,
 The beau affects the politician,
 Wit is the citizen's³ ambition,
 45 Poor Pope philosophy displays on
 With so much rhyme and little reason,
 And though he argues ne'er so long
 That all is right, his head is wrong.⁴

None strive to know their proper merit
 50 But strain for wisdom, beauty, spirit,
 And lose the praise that is their due
 While they've th' impossible in view.
 So have I seen the injudicious heir
 To add one window the whole house impair.
 55 Instinct the hound does better teach,
 Who never undertook to preach;
 The frightened hare from dogs does run
 But not attempts to bear a gun.
 Here many noble thoughts occur
 60 But I prolixity abhor,
 And will pursue th' instructive tale
 To show the wise in some things fail.

The rev'rend lover with surprise
 Peeps in her bubbies,^o and her eyes,
 65 And kisses both, and tries—and tries.

breasts

¹ ox ... Horace writ Horace, Epistles 1.14.43: "The ox desires the saddle."

² citizen As distinguished from a member of the gentry or nobility; a tradesman.

³ That all ... wrong Cf. Pope's Essay on Man (1733), which concludes, "One truth is clear, 'Whatever is, is right.'"

The Reasons ... Room This poem is a response to Jonathan Swift's "The Lady's Dressing Room" (1732). Its original title was "The Dean's Provocation for Writing the Lady's Dressing Room."

The evening in this hellish play,
Beside his guineas thrown away,
Provoked the priest to that degree
He swore, "The fault is not in me.
70 Your damned close stool¹ so near my nose,
Your dirty smock, and stinking toes
Would make a Hercules as tame
As any beau that you can name."

The nymph grown furious roared, "By God!

75 The blame lies all in sixty odd,"²
And scornful pointing to the door
Cried, "Fumbler, see my face no more."
"With all my heart I'll go away,
But nothing done, I'll nothing pay.
80 Give back the money." "How," cried she,
"Would you palm such a cheat on me!
For poor four pound to roar and bellow—
Why sure you want some new Prunella?"³
"I'll be revenged, you saucy quean"⁴
85 (Replies the disappointed Dean),
"I'll so describe your dressing room
The very Irish shall not come."
She answered short, "I'm glad you'll write.
You'll furnish paper when I shite."

—1734

The Lover: A Ballad

At length, by so much importunity pressed,
Take, (Molly⁴), at once, the inside of my breast;
This stupid indiff'rence so often you blame
Is not owing to nature, to fear, or to shame;
5 I am not as cold as a Virgin in lead,
Nor is Sunday's sermon so strong in my head;
I know but too well how time flies along,
That we live but few years and yet fewer are young.

¹ close stool Chamber pot enclosed in a stool or box.

² in sixty odd I.e., in his old age.

³ Prunella Name commonly ascribed at the time to a prostitute or promiscuous woman; also, a type of cloth used to make clergymen's robes.

⁴ Molly Maria Skerrett, a friend of Montagu's and the mistress of Prime Minister Robert Walpole.

But I hate to be cheated, and never will buy
10 Long years of repentance for moments of joy.
Oh, was there a man (but where shall I find Good sense and good nature so equally joined?)
Would value his pleasure, contribute to mine,
Not meanly would boast, nor lewdly design,
15 Not over severe, yet not stupidly vain,
For I would have the power though not give the pain;

No pedant yet learnèd, not rakehelly⁵ gay
Or laughing because he has nothing to say,
To all my whole sex obliging and free,
20 Yet never be fond of any but me;
In public preserve the decorums are just,
And show in his eyes he is true to his trust,
Then rarely approach, and respectfully bow,
Yet not fulsomely pert, nor yet foppishly low.

25 But when the long hours of public are past
And we meet with champagne and a chicken at last,
May every fond pleasure that hour endear,
Be banished afar both discretion and fear,
Forgetting or scorning the airs of the crowd
30 He may cease to be formal, and I to be proud,
Till lost in the joy we confess that we live,
And he may be rude, and yet I may forgive.

And that my delight may be solidly fixed,
Let the friend and the lover be handsomely mixed,
35 In whose tender bosom my soul might confide,
Whose kindness can sooth me, whose counsel could guide.
From such a dear lover as here I describe
No danger should fright me, no millions should bribe;
But till this astonishing creature I know,
40 As I long have lived chaste, I will keep myself so.

I never will share with the wanton coquette,
Or be caught by a vain affectation of wit.
The toasters⁶ and songsters may try all their art
But never shall enter the pass of my heart.
45 I loathe the lewd rake,⁷ the dressed fopling⁸ despise; fool
Before such pursuers the nice⁹ virgin flies; fastidious

⁵ rakehelly In the manner of a rascal or scoundrel.

⁶ toasters Those who propose toasts; i.e., admirers of women.

⁷ rake Seducer of women.

And as Ovid has sweetly in parables told
We harden like trees, and like rivers are cold.¹

—1747

Epistle from Mrs. Y[onge]² to Her Husband

Think not this paper comes with vain pretense
To move your pity, or to mourn th' offense.
Too well I know that hard obdurate heart;
No softening mercy there will take my part,
Nor can a woman's arguments prevail,
When even your patron's wise example fails.³
But this last privilege I still retain;
Th' oppressed and injured always may complain.
Too, too severely laws of honor bind
The weak submissive sex of womankind.
If sighs have gained or force compelled our hand,
Deceived by art, or urged by stern command,
Whatever motive binds the fatal tie,
The judging world expects our constancy.
Just heaven! (for sure in heaven does justice reign, Though tricks below that sacred name profane)
To you appealing I submit my cause,
Nor fear a judgment from impartial laws.
All bargains but conditional are made;
The purchase void, the creditor unpaid;
Defrauded servants are from service free;
A wounded slave regains his liberty.
For wives ill used no remedy remains,
To daily racks condemned, and to eternal chains.
From whence is this unjust distinction grown?
Are we not formed with passions like your own?

as Ovid ... cold In Ovid's Metamorphoses, the virgin Daphne is turned into a laurel tree to escape the advances of the god Apollo, while Arethusa prefers being transformed into a fountain to surrendering to the pursuits of the god Alpheus.

¹ Mrs. Y[onge] After Mrs. Yonge and her husband, infamous libertine William Yonge, were separated, she began an affair with another man. Though Mr. Yonge had had numerous affairs throughout their marriage, he successfully sued his wife's lover for damages and then filed for divorce. In a public, well-attended trial, Mr. Yonge was granted not only his divorce but also the majority of his ex-wife's fortune.

When ... fails Prime Minister Robert Walpole also engaged in extra-marital affairs, but, unlike Yonge, he endured it when his wife did the same.

Nature with equal fire our souls endued,
Our minds as haughty, and as warm our blood;
O'er the wide world your pleasures you pursue,
The change is justified by something new;
But we must sigh in silence—and be true.
Our sex's weakness you expose and blame
(Of every prating⁴ fop the common theme),
Yet from this weakness you suppose is due
Sublimar virtue than your Cato⁵ knew.
Had heaven designed us trials so severe,
It would have formed our tempers then to bear.
And I have borne (oh, what have I not borne!)
The pang of jealousy, the insults of scorn.
Wearied at length, I from your sight remove,
And place my future hopes in secret love.
In the gay bloom of glowing youth retired,
I quit the woman's joy to be admired,
With that small pension your hard heart allows,
Renounce your fortune, and release your vows.
To custom (though unjust) so much is due;
I hide my frailty from the public view.
My conscience clear, yet sensible of shame,
My life I hazard, to preserve my fame.⁶
And I prefer this low inglorious state
To vile dependence on the thing I hate—
But you pursue me to this last retreat.
Dragged into light, my tender crime is shown
And every circumstance of fondness known.
Beneath the shelter of the law you stand,
And urge my ruin with a cruel hand,
While to my fault thus rigidly severe,
Tamely submissive to the man you fear.⁷
This wretched outcast, this abandoned wife,
Has yet this joy to sweeten shameful life:
By your mean conduct, infamously loose,
You are at once my accuser and excuse.
Let me be damned by the censorious prude
(Stupidly dull, or spiritually lewd),
My hapless case will surely pity find
From every just and reasonable mind.

⁴ prating Chattering, talking too much.

⁵ Cato Roman politician Marcus Porcius Cato, an opponent of Caesar's who, after Caesar's victory, committed suicide rather than submit to his tyrannical authority.

⁶ fame Good name or character.

⁷ the man you fear Sir Robert Walpole.

When to the final sentence I submit,
The lips condemn me, but their souls acquit.

70 No more my husband, to your pleasures go,
The sweets of your recovered freedom know.
Go: court the brittle friendship of the great,
Smile at his board,^o or at his levee¹ wait; dining table
And when dismissed, to madam's toilet² fly,
More than her chambermaids or glasses,^o lie, mirrors

75 Tell her how young she looks, how heavenly fair,
Admire the lilies and the roses there.
Your high ambition may be gratified,
Some cousin of her own be made your bride,
And you the father of a glorious race
80 Endowed with Ch—I's strength and Low—I's face.³
—1977 (written 1724)

¹ levee Assembly or reception of visitors.

² toilet Dressing room, where it was fashionable for women of distinction to receive visitors as they were finishing their toilet.

³ Endowed ... face References to General Charles Churchill, who was thought to have had an affair with Lady Walpole, and Anthony Lowther, a well-known ladies' man.

ELIZA HAYWOOD

1693 – 1756

One of the most prolific writers of the eighteenth century is also one of the most elusive. Little is known of Eliza Haywood's private life, yet she produced more than 80 titles and wrote some of the most popular works of the first half of the century. Her fame began in 1719 when she published Love in Excess; or, the Fatal Inquiry, an amorous tale of adventure that became one of the best selling books of the early eighteenth century.

Born in London as Eliza Fowler, probably but not certainly in 1693, Haywood left London and married by 1714, when she began a theater apprenticeship in Dublin under the name Eliza Haywood. We know that she had two children (precisely when is unknown), and that her marriage had ended by 1717 when she returned to England and toured with various theater companies. One of her few letters suggests that she began writing to support herself and her children.

Love in Excess began a writing career that progressed at an astonishing pace: Haywood averaged five titles a year in the 1720s and produced two collected editions by 1725. From 1721 until 1724 she had a romantic relationship with the poet Richard Savage, and from 1724 probably until her death she lived with William Hatchett, a minor playwright and actor. Little else is known of her domestic life. Her first biographer, David Erskine Baker, claimed in 1764 that she deliberately obscured her history: "from a supposition of some improper liberties being taken with her character after death, by the intermixture of truth and falsehood with her history, she laid a solemn injunction on a person who was well acquainted with all the particulars of it, not to communicate to any one the least circumstance relating to her."

Although the details of Haywood's personal life remain vague, her public persona was well known. Her dozens of amorous fictions published in the 1720s and 1730s found a wide audience; she was dubbed the "Great arbitress of passion" by one contemporary poet, and "Mrs. Novel" by Henry Fielding (in his 1730 play The Author's Farce). Fantomina is representative of this early fiction. First published in her 1725 collection Secret Histories, Novels, and Poems, it explores male inconstancy, female agency, and sexual adventure, as well as the social repercussions of such adventure.

In the 1730s the pace of Haywood's fiction writing slowed as she returned to the theater. From 1729 to 1737 she wrote or co-wrote several plays and acted in at least six. Collaborating with William Hatchett, she produced the successful Opera of Operas in 1733, a musical adaptation of Fielding's Tragedy of Tragedies. During this period she also anonymously published The Adventures of Eovaii, Princess of Ivajeo (1736), a satire of English politics and—in particular—of Sir Robert Walpole, Prime Minister from 1721 to 1742. In subsequent years she translated works from French, wrote a 1741 parody of Pamela, became a publisher herself, continued to act in the theater, and in 1749 wrote a controversial political pamphlet that led to her arrest (though not her prosecution).

In the last fifteen years of her life, Haywood's writing became more domestic, moral, and didactic. Novels such as The History of Miss Betsy Thoughtless (1751) and The History of Jemmy and Jenny Jessamy (1753) endeavor not only to entertain readers but also to instruct them in such matters as courtship and marriage. She also published the first periodical written for women, The Female Spectator, which appeared in 24 installments from April 1744 to May 1746 and touched on philosophical, political, and scientific, as well as literary, matters. In 1756 she began a new periodical entitled The Young Lady, but she announced in an early issue that she was too ill to continue with the journal. She died shortly thereafter, on 25 February 1756.

It was typical of the time that, however widely a woman writer might be read, she would also be criticized for having made writing her profession. In The Dunciad (1728) for example, Alexander Pope satirized those he considered to be hack writers, and castigated Haywood in particular. But other contemporaries acknowledged her talent, and present-day critics are increasingly recognizing her important contribution to the development of the novel. Haywood was one of the earliest novelists to explore inner states and feelings. Her reputation may well continue to grow: scholars continue to attribute newly-found titles to this prolific pioneer of the novel.

Fantomina: or, Love in a Maze

Eliza Haywood was first famous as an author of amatory fiction, her work raising the popularity of an already popular genre; Fantomina: or, Love in a Maze (1725) was one of her many novels of this kind. Although amatory fictions were read by both genders, such works were considered to be books by and for women, focusing on what was thought to be the female reader's greatest interest: sexual and romantic love. In their real lives, the women readers of books like Fantomina were disadvantaged by the sexual mores of the time. Celibacy before marriage was the rule—but it was a rule not enforced for men, while a woman discovered to have broken it faced disgrace. Social success (and financial stability) also required that an unmarried woman attract a husband without appearing improperly forward—and without attracting socially dangerous sexual advances. Amatory fictions offered imaginary escape from these confining expectations, but they also illustrated the dangers facing women who transgressed; the stories were presented as means of moral instruction. Whatever delight a reader might take in accounts of scandalous sexuality would be tempered by the story line. Unhappy consequences were inevitably imposed on women characters who acted upon their desires.

While its engagement with romance and sexuality certainly places Fantomina in the genre of amatory fiction, the work toys with the expectations of its eighteenth-century readers. Many amatory fictions—including some of Haywood's own—follow a formula in which an innocent woman becomes the passive victim of a deceitful, experienced man. In this formula, the seducer, having captured the woman's virtue, quickly tires of and abandons her; she weeps and protests, but is helpless to prevent him. In Fantomina, the unnamed heroine takes an atypically active role in orchestrating her own seduction, and her use of careful deception and disguise complicates the usual pattern of innocence betrayed.

An eighteenth-century audience may also have found Fantomina shockingly unclear in the moral attitude it displays toward its characters. The unnamed heroine's unwanted pregnancy and banishment to a French monastery may look like onerous consequences to present-day readers, but the heroine gets off lightly by the standards of the genre; usually, such amatory fictions ended with the heroine's repentance, death, or abject misery, with explicit didactic commentary from the narrator to emphasize the moral point. Some eighteenth-century readers may well have interpreted Fantomina's ending as a just punishment for the heroine. But others might have entertained the thought that banishment to a convent would not necessarily mean an end to the sexual life of a literary character; nuns are a common subject in pornographic writing of the period, and in a number of amatory works of the period, lovers escape from convents.

It is worth noting that the heroine of Fantomina is only able to escape the social consequences of her actions for as long as she does because she has financial and personal freedom almost unheard-of for a real woman in the 1720s. The first three disguises she adopts—a well-off woman raped by a suitor and abandoned to a likely fate of prostitution, a maid exploited by her employer, and a widow at risk of poverty because inheritance laws do not protect her rights—provide a somewhat more realistic vision of women's circumstances in the period.

Haywood called Fantomina a "Masquerade Novel," and its central theme of disguise reflects the early eighteenth century's preoccupation with masks. Beginning in the late seventeenth century, women often wore masks to the theater; soon after, they began to wear them with elaborate costumes to masquerade balls, which reached a height of popularity in the 1720s. The concealed identity that masks represented offered women a respite from social conventions, allowing them to act relatively freely without fear for their reputations. For men, masked women possessed the allure of mystery; as William Wycherley dryly observed, "a woman masked, like a covered dish, gives a man curiosity and appetite." Perhaps not surprisingly, masquerades were an object of moral condemnation and quickly became associated with unsavory sexuality; at the time Haywood was writing Fantomina, the mask was widely considered a symbol of prostitution.

Fantomina: or, Love in a Maze

*In love the victors from the vanquished fly.
They fly that wound, and they pursue that die.*¹

WALLER.

A young lady of distinguished birth, beauty, wit, and spirit happened to be in a box² one night at the playhouse, where, though there were a great number of celebrated toasts,³ she perceived several gentlemen extremely pleased themselves with entertaining a woman who sat in a corner of the pit and, by her air and manner of receiving them, might easily be known to be one of those who come there for no other purpose than to create acquaintance with as many as seem desirous of it. She could not help testifying her contempt of men who, regardless either of the play or circle,⁴ threw away their time in such a manner to some ladies that sat by her. But they, either less surprised by being more accustomed to such sights than she—who had been bred for the most part in the country—or not of a disposition to consider anything very deeply, took but little notice of it. She still thought of it, however, and the longer she reflected on it, the greater was her wonder that men, some of whom she knew were accounted to have wit, should have tastes so very depraved. This excited a curiosity in her to know in what manner these creatures were addressed. She was young, a stranger to the world and, consequently, to the dangers of it, and, having nobody in town at that time to whom she was obliged to be accountable for her actions, did in everything as her inclinations or humours⁵ rendered most agreeable to her. Therefore she thought it not in the least a fault to put in practice a little whim which came immediately into her head, to dress herself as near as she could in the fashion of those women who make sale of their favours and set herself in the way of being accosted as such a one, having at that time no other aim than the gratification of an innocent curiosity. She no sooner designed this frolic than she put it in execution and, muffling her hoods over her face, went the next night into the gallery-box⁶ and, practicing as much as she had observed at that distance the behaviour of that woman, was not long before she found her disguise had answered the ends she wore it for. A crowd of purchasers of all degrees and capacities were in a moment gathered about her, each endeavouring to out-bid the other in offering her a price for her embraces. She listened to them all and was not a little diverted in her mind at the disappointment she should give to so many, each of which thought himself secure of gaining her. She was told by them all that she was the most lovely woman in the world, and some cried, "Gad, she is mighty like my fine

¹ "In love ... die" Edmund Waller, "To A.H., of the Different Successes of Their Loves" (1645), ll. 27–28.

² box Theater compartment that seats a small number of audience members.

³ celebrated toasts Women whose health is frequently toasted (i.e., women with many admirers).

⁴ circle Tier of theater seating.

⁵ humours Dispositions.

⁶ gallery-box Inexpensive box in the theater's highest tier of seats.

Lady Such-a-one”—naming her own name. She was naturally vain and received no small pleasure in hearing herself praised, though in the person of another and a supposed prostitute, but she dispatched as soon as she could all that had hitherto attacked her when she saw the accomplished Beauplaisir was making his way through the crowd as fast as he was able, to reach the bench she sat on. She had often seen him in the drawing room;¹ had talked with him (but then her quality and reputed virtue kept him from using her with that freedom she now expected he would do); and had discovered something in him which had made her often think she should not be displeased if he would abate some part of his reserve. Now was the time to have her wishes answered. He looked in her face and fancied, as many others had done, that she very much resembled that lady whom she really was, but the vast disparity there appeared between their characters prevented him from entertaining even the most distant thought that they could be the same. He addressed her at first with the usual salutations of her pretended profession, as, “Are you engaged, Madam? Will you permit me to wait on you home after the play? By Heaven, you are a fine girl! How long have you used this house?” and such like questions. But, perceiving she had a turn of wit and a genteel manner in her raillery² beyond what is frequently to be found among those wretches who are for the most part gentlewomen but by necessity, few of them having had an education suitable to what they affect to appear, he changed the form of his conversation and showed her it was not because he understood no better that he had made use of expressions so little polite. In fine,³ they were infinitely charmed with each other. He was transported⁴ to find so much beauty and wit in a woman who he doubted not but on very easy terms he might enjoy, and she found a vast deal of pleasure in conversing with him in this free and unrestrained manner. They passed their time all the play with an equal satisfaction, but when it was over, she found herself involved in a difficulty which before never entered into her head, but which she knew not well how to get over.

The passion he professed for her was not of that humble nature which can be content with distant adorations. He resolved not to part from her without the gratifications of those desires she had inspired and, presuming on the liberties which her supposed function allowed of, told her she must either go with him to some convenient house of his procuring or permit him to wait on her to her own lodgings. Never had she been in such a dilemma. Three or four times did she open her mouth to confess her real quality,⁵ but the influence of her ill stars prevented it by putting an excuse into her head which did the business as well, and at the same time did not take from her the power of seeing and entertaining him a second time with the same freedom she had done this. She told him she was under obligations to a man who maintained her and whom she durst not disappoint, having promised to meet him that night at a house hard by.⁶ This story, so like what those ladies sometimes tell, was not at all suspected by Beauplaisir. And, assuring her he would be far from doing her a prejudice, he desired that in return for the pain he should suffer in being deprived of her company that night, that she would order her affairs so as not to render him unhappy the next. She gave a solemn promise to be in the same box on the morrow evening, and they took leave of each other—he to the tavern to drown the remembrance of his disappointment, she in a hackney-chair⁷ hurried home to indulge contemplation on the frolic she had taken, designing nothing less on her first reflections than to keep the promise she had made him, and hugging herself with joy that she had the good luck to come off undiscovered.

But these cogitations⁸ were but of a short continuance; they vanished with the hurry of her spirits and were succeeded by others vastly different and ruinous. All the charms of Beauplaisir came fresh into her mind; she languished, she almost died for another opportunity of conversing with him, and not all the admonitions of her discretion were effectual to oblige her to deny laying hold of that which offered itself the next night. She depended on the strength of her virtue to bear her safe

¹ drawing room Gathering of nobility.

² raillery Teasing.

³ In fine In the end.

⁴ transported Ecstatic.

⁵ quality Social status.

⁶ hard by Close by.

⁷ hackney-chair Sedan chair, in which one passenger was carried by two people by means of poles.

⁸ cogitations Reflections.

through trials more dangerous than she apprehended this to be, and never having been addressed by him as Lady, was resolved to receive his devoirs as a town-mistress,¹ imagining a world of satisfaction to herself in engaging him in the character of such a one, and in observing the surprise he would be in to find himself refused by a woman who he supposed granted her favours without exception. Strange and unaccountable were the whimsies she was possessed of, wild and incoherent her desires, unfixed and undetermined her resolutions, but in that of seeing Beauplaisir in the manner she had lately done. As for her proceedings with him, or how a second time to escape him without discovering who she was, she could neither assure herself, nor whether or not in the last extremity she would do so. Bent, however, on meeting him, whatever should be the consequence, she went out some hours before the time of going to the playhouse and took lodgings in a house not very far from it, intending that, if he should insist on passing some part of the night with her, to carry him there, thinking she might with more security to her honour entertain him at a place where she was mistress than at any of his own choosing.

The appointed hour being arrived, she had the satisfaction to find his love in his assiduity.² He was there before her, and nothing could be more tender than the manner in which he accosted her. But from the first moment she came in to that of the play being done, he continued to assure her no consideration should prevail with him to part from her again, as she had done the night before, and she rejoiced to think she had taken that precaution of providing herself with a lodging to which she thought she might invite him without running any risk, either of her virtue or reputation. Having told him she would admit of his accompanying her home, he seemed perfectly satisfied and, leading her to the place, which was not above twenty houses distant, would have ordered a collation³ to be brought after them. But she would not permit it, telling him she was not one of those who suffered themselves to be treated at their own lodgings, and as soon she was come in, sent a servant belonging to the house to provide a very handsome supper and wine, and everything was served to table in a manner which showed the director neither wanted⁴ money, nor was ignorant how it should be laid out.

This proceeding, though it did not take from him the opinion that she was what she appeared to be, yet it gave him thoughts of her which he had not before. He believed her a mistress, but believed her to be one of a superior rank, and began to imagine the possession of her would be much more expensive than at first he had expected. But, not being of a humour to grudge anything for his pleasures, he gave himself no farther trouble than what were occasioned by fears of not having money enough to reach her price about him.

Supper being over, which was intermixed with a vast deal of amorous conversation, he began to explain himself more than he had done, and both by his words and behaviour let her know he would not be denied that happiness the freedoms she allowed had made him hope. It was in vain she would have retracted the encouragement she had given; in vain she endeavoured to delay till the next meeting the fulfilling of his wishes. She had now gone too far to retreat. He was bold; he was resolute; she, fearful, confused, altogether unprepared to resist in such encounters, and rendered more so by the extreme liking she had to him. Shocked, however, at the apprehension of really losing her honour, she struggled all she could, and was just going to reveal the whole secret of her name and quality when the thoughts of the liberty he had taken with her, and those he still continued to prosecute, prevented her with representing the danger of being exposed and the whole affair made a theme for public ridicule. Thus much, indeed, she told him: that she was a virgin and had assumed this manner of behaviour only to engage him. But that he little regarded, or if he had, would have been far from obliging him to desist. Nay, in the present burning eagerness of desire, 'tis probable that had he been acquainted both with who and what she really was, the knowledge of her birth would not have influenced him with respect sufficient to have curbed the wild exuberance of his luxurious⁵ wishes, or made him in that longing—that impatient moment—change the form of his addresses. In fine, she was undone, and he gained a victory so highly rapturous that, had he known over whom, scarce devoirs Attentions; as a town-mistress As if she were a prostitute.

¹ assiduity Persistence, eagerness to please.

³ collation Small meal often made up of assorted cold foods.

⁴ wanted Lacked.

⁵ luxurious Passionate, self-indulgent.

could he have triumphed more. Her tears, however, and the distraction she appeared in after the ruinous ecstasy was past, as it heightened his wonder, so it abated his satisfaction. He could not imagine for what reason a woman who, if she intended not to be a mistress, had counterfeited the part of one and taken so much pains to engage him, should lament a consequence which she could not but expect—and, till the last test, seemed inclinable to grant—and was both surprised and troubled at the mystery. He omitted nothing that he thought might make her easy and, still retaining an opinion that the hope of interest¹ had been the chief motive which had led her to act in the manner she had done (and believing that she might know so little of him as to suppose, now she had nothing left to give he might not make that recompence she expected for her favours), to put her out of that pain, he pulled out of his pocket a purse of gold, entreating her to accept of that as an earnest of what he intended to do for her, assuring her with ten thousand protestations that he would spare nothing which his whole estate could purchase to procure her content and happiness. This treatment made her quite forget the part she had assumed and, throwing it from her with an air of disdain, "Is this a reward," said she, "for condescensions such as I have yielded to? Can all the wealth you are possessed of make a reparation for my loss of honour? Oh no, I am undone beyond the power of heaven itself to help me!" She uttered many more such exclamations, which the amazed Beauplaisir heard without being able to reply to, till, by degrees sinking from that rage of temper, her eyes resumed their softening glances and, guessing at the consternation he was in, "No, my dear Beauplaisir," added she, "your love alone can compensate for the shame you have involved me in. Be you sincere and constant, and I hereafter shall, perhaps, be satisfied with my fate and forgive myself the folly that betrayed me to you."

Beauplaisir thought he could not have a better opportunity than these words gave him of enquiring who she was and wherefore she had feigned herself to be of a profession which he was now convinced she was not. And after he had made her a thousand vows of an affection as inviolable and ardent² as she could wish to find in him, entreated she would inform him by what means his happiness had been brought about, and also to whom he was indebted for the bliss he had enjoyed. Some remains of yet unextinguished modesty and sense of shame made her blush exceedingly at this demand. But, recollecting herself in a little time, she told him so much of the truth as to what related to the frolic she had taken of satisfying her curiosity in what manner mistresses of the sort she appeared to be were treated by those who addressed them, but forbore discovering her true name and quality for the reasons she had done before—resolving, if he boasted of this affair he should not have it in his power to touch her character. She therefore said she was the daughter of a country gentleman who was come to town to buy clothes and that she was called Fantomina. He had no reason to distrust the truth of this story and was therefore satisfied with it, but did not doubt by the beginning of her conduct but that in the end she would be in reality the thing she so artfully had counterfeited, and had good nature enough to pity the misfortunes he imagined would be her lot. But to tell her so or offer his advice in that point was not his business, at least as yet.

They parted not till towards morning, and she obliged him to a willing vow of visiting her the next day at three in the afternoon. It was too late for her to go home that night; therefore, she contented herself with lying there. In the morning she sent for the woman of the house to come up to her and, easily perceiving by her manner that she was a woman who might be influenced by gifts, made her a present of a couple of broad pieces³ and desired her that if the gentleman who had been there the night before should ask any questions concerning her, that he should be told she was lately come out of the country, had lodged there about a fortnight,⁴ and that her name was Fantomina. "I shall," also added she, "lie but seldom here, nor, indeed, ever come but in those times when I expect to meet him. I would therefore have you order it so that he may think I am but just gone out if he should happen by any accident to call when I am not here, for I would not for the world have him imagine I do not constantly lodge here." The landlady assured her she would do everything

¹ interest Financial gain.

² ardent Fiery, intensely zealous.

³ broad pieces Twenty-shilling coins. This amount would be insignificant to a gentlewoman, but significant to the recipient.

⁴ a fortnight Two weeks.

as she desired and gave her to understand she wanted not the gift of secrecy.

Everything being ordered at this home for the security of her reputation, she repaired to the other, where she easily excused to an unsuspecting aunt, with whom she boarded, her having been abroad all night, saying she went with a gentleman and his lady in a barge to a little country seat¹ of theirs up the river, all of them designing to return the same evening, but that one of the bargemen happening to be taken ill on the sudden, and no other waterman to be got that night, they were obliged to tarry till morning. Thus did this lady's wit and vivacity assist her in all but where it was most needful. She had discernment to foresee and avoid all those ills which might attend the loss of her reputation, but was wholly blind to those of the ruin of her virtue, and, having managed her affairs so as to secure the one, grew perfectly easy with the remembrance she had forfeited the other. The more she reflected on the merits of Beauplaisir, the more she excused herself for what she had done. And the prospect of that continued bliss she expected to share with him took from her all remorse for having engaged in an affair which promised her so much satisfaction, and in which she found not the least danger of misfortune. "If he is really," said she, to herself, "the faithful, the constant lover he has sworn to be, how charming will be our amour? And if he should be false, grow satiated like other men, I shall but, at the worst, have the private vexation of knowing I have lost him—the intrigue being a secret, my disgrace will be so too. I shall hear no whispers as I pass, 'She is forsaken.' The odious word forsaken will never wound my ears, nor will my wrongs excite either the mirth or pity of the talking world. It will not be even in the power of my undoer himself to triumph over me. And while he laughs at and perhaps despises the fond, the yielding Fantomina, he will revere and esteem the virtuous, the reserved Lady." In this manner did she applaud her own conduct and exult with the imagination that she had more prudence than all her sex beside. And it must be confessed indeed that she preserved an oeconomy² in the management of this intrigue beyond what almost any woman but herself ever did: in the first place, by making no person in the world a confidante in it, and in the next, in concealing from Beauplaisir himself the knowledge who she was. For though she met him three or four days in a week at that lodging she had taken for that purpose, yet as much as he employed her time and thoughts, she was never missed from any assembly she had been accustomed to frequent. The business of her love has engrossed her till six in the evening, and before seven she has been dressed in a different habit³ and in another place. Slippers and a nightgown⁴ loosely flowing has been the garb in which he has left the languishing Fantomina; laced and adorned with all the blaze of jewels has he, in less than an hour after, beheld at the royal chapel, the palace gardens, drawing room, opera, or play, the haughty, awe-inspiring lady. A thousand times has he stood amazed at the prodigious likeness between his little mistress and this court beauty, but was still as far from imagining they were the same as he was the first hour he had accosted her in the playhouse, though it is not impossible but that her resemblance to this celebrated lady might keep his inclination alive something longer than otherwise they would have been, and that it was to the thoughts of this as he supposed unenjoyed charmer she owed in great measure the vigour of his latter caresses.

¹ seat Home.

² oeconomy Prudent decision-making and self-management.

But he varied not so much from his sex as to be able to prolong desire to any great length after possession. The rifled charms of Fantomina soon lost their poignancy⁵ and grew tasteless and insipid. And when, the season of the year inviting the company to the Bath,⁶ she offered to accompany him, he made an excuse to go without her. She easily perceived his coldness and the reason why he pretended her going would be inconvenient, and endured as much from the discovery as any of her sex could do. She dissembled it, however, before him, and took her leave of him with the show of no other concern than his absence occasioned. But this she did to take from him all suspicion of her following him, as she intended and had already laid a scheme for. From her first finding out that he designed to leave her behind, she plainly saw it was for no other reason than that being tired of her conversation, he was willing to be

³ habit Attire.

⁴ nightgown Informal dress.

⁵ poignancy Sharpness.

⁶ Bath Resort town and social center for the upper classes.

at liberty to pursue new conquests and, wisely considering that complaints,¹ tears, swoonings, and all the extravagancies which women make use of in such cases have little prevailance over a heart inclined to rove, and only serve to render those who practice them more contemptible by robbing them of that beauty which alone can bring back the fugitive lover, she resolved to take another course. And, remembering the height of transport she enjoyed when the agreeable Beauplaisir kneeled at her feet, imploring her first favours, she longed to prove² the same again. Not but a woman of her beauty and accomplishments might have beheld a thousand in that condition Beauplaisir had been, but with her sex's modesty she had not also thrown off another virtue equally valuable, though generally unfortunate: constancy. She loved Beauplaisir. It was only he whose solicitations could give her pleasure and, had she seen the whole species despairing, dying for her sake, it might, perhaps, have been a satisfaction to her pride, but none to her more tender inclination. Her design was once more to engage him. To hear him sigh, to see him languish, to feel the strenuous pressures of his eager arms, to be compelled, to be sweetly forced to what she wished with equal ardour was what she wanted and what she had formed a stratagem to obtain, in which she promised herself success.

She no sooner heard he had left the town than, making a pretence to her aunt that she was going to visit a relation in the country, she went towards Bath, attended but by two servants who she found reasons to quarrel with on the road and discharged. Clothing herself in a habit she had brought with her, she forsook the coach and went into a wagon, in which equipage she arrived at Bath. The dress she was in was a round-eared cap, a short red petticoat, and a little jacket of grey stuff.³ All the rest of her accoutrements were answerable to these, and, joined with a broad country dialect, a rude⁴ unpolished air (which she, having been bred in these parts, knew very well how to imitate), with her hair and eyebrows blacked, made it impossible for her to be known or taken for any other than what she seemed.

Thus disguised did she offer herself to service in the house where Beauplaisir lodged, having made it her business to find out immediately where he was. Notwithstanding this metamorphosis she was still extremely pretty, and the mistress of the house, happening at that time to want a maid, was very glad of the opportunity of taking her. She was presently received into the family and had a post in it such as she would have chosen had she been left at her liberty: that of making the gentlemen's beds, getting them their breakfasts, and waiting on them in their chambers. Fortune in this exploit was extremely on her side. There were no others of the male sex in the house than an old gentleman who had lost the use of his limbs with the rheumatism and had come thither for the benefit of the waters,⁵ and her beloved Beauplaisir, so that she was in no apprehensions of any amorous violence but where she wished to find it. Nor were her designs disappointed. He was fired with the first sight of her, and though he did not presently take any farther notice of her than giving her two or three hearty kisses, yet she, who now understood that language but too well, easily saw they were the prelude to more substantial joys. Coming the next morning to bring his chocolate as he had ordered, he caught her by the pretty leg—which the shortness of her petticoat did not in the least oppose—then, pulling her gently to him, asked her how long she had been at service, how many sweethearts she had, if she had ever been in love, and many other such questions befitting one of the degree she appeared to be, all which she answered with such seeming innocence as more inflamed the amorous heart of him who talked to her. He compelled her to sit in his lap and, gazing on her blushing beauties, which, if possible, received addition from her plain and rural dress, he soon lost the power of containing himself. His wild desires burst out in all his words and actions. He called her "little angel," "cherubim"; swore he must enjoy her though death were to be the consequence; devoured her lips, her breasts with greedy kisses; held to his burning bosom her half-yielding, half-reluctant body; nor suffered her to get loose till he had ravaged all and glutted each rapacious sense with the sweet beauties of the pretty Celia—for that was the name she bore in this second expedition. Generous as liberality itself to all who gave him joy this way, he gave her a handsome sum

¹ complaints Expressions of sadness.

² prove Undergo.

³ The dress ... grey stuff Plain clothing of the sort typically worn in the country; stuff Wool fabric.

⁴ rude Rustic.

benefit of the waters Bath was known for its hot springs.

of gold, which she durst not now refuse for fear of creating some mistrust and losing the heart she so lately had regained. Therefore, taking it with an humble curtsy and a well counterfeited show of surprise and joy, she cried, "O law, Sir! What must I do for all this?" He laughed at her simplicity and, kissing her again, though less fervently than he had done before, bade her not be out of the way when he came home at night. She promised she would not, and very obediently kept her word.

His stay at Bath exceeded not a month, but in that time his supposed country lass had persecuted him so much with her fondness that, in spite of the eagerness with which he first enjoyed her, he was at last grown more weary of her than he had been of Fantomina; which, she perceiving, would not be troublesome but, quitting her service, remained privately in the town till she heard he was on his return, and in that time provided herself of another disguise to carry on a third plot, which her inventing brain had furnished her with, once more to renew his twice-decayed ardours. The dress she had ordered to be made was such as widows wear in their first mourning, which, together with the most afflicted and penitential countenance that ever was seen, was no small alteration to her who used to seem all gaiety. To add to this, her hair, which she was accustomed to wear very loose, both when Fantomina and Celia, was now tied back so strait,¹ and her pinnars² coming so very forward, that there was none of it to be seen. In fine, her habit and her air were so much changed that she was not more difficult to be known in the rude country girl than she was now in the sorrowful widow.

She knew that Beauplaisir came alone in his chariot³ to Bath, and in the time of her being servant in the house where he lodged, heard nothing of any body that was to accompany him to London, and hoped he would return in the same manner he had gone. She therefore hired horses and a man to attend her to an inn about ten miles on this side Bath, where, having discharged them, she waited till the chariot should come by, which when it did, and she saw that he was alone in it, she called to him that drove it to stop a moment and, going to the door, saluted the master with these words:

strait Tight.

² pinnars Flaps attached to a cap, also called a pinner, that is worn pinned to the head, especially by upper-class women.

³ chariot Carriage.

The Distress'd and Wretched, Sir, (said she,) never fail to excite Compassion in a generous Mind; and I hope I am not deceiv'd in my Opinion that yours is such:—You have the Appearance of a Gentleman, and cannot, when you hear my Story, refuse that Assistance which is in your Power to give to an unhappy Woman, who without it, may be render'd the most miserable of all created Beings.

IT would not be very easy to represent the Surprise, so odd an Address created in the Mind of him to whom it was made.—She had not the Appearance of one who wanted Charity; and what other Favour she requir'd he cou'd not conceive: But telling her, she might command any Thing in his Power, gave her Encouragement to declare herself in this Manner: You may judge, (resumed she,) by the melancholy Garb I am in, that I have lately lost all that ought to be valuable to Womankind; but it is impossible for you to guess the Greatness of my Misfortune, unless you had known my Husband, who was Master of every Perfection to endear him to a Wife's Affections.—But, notwithstanding, I look on myself as the most unhappy of my Sex in out-living him, I must so far obey the Dictates of my Discretion, as to take care of the little Fortune he left: behind him, which being in the Hands of a Brother of his in London, will be all carry'd off to Holland, where he is going to settle; if I reach not the Town before he leaves it, I am undone for ever.—To which End I left Bristol, the Place where we liv'd, hoping to get a Place in the Stage at Bath, but they were all taken up before I came; and being, by a Hurt I got in a Fall, render'd incapable of travelling any long Journey on Horseback, I have no Way to go to London, and must be inevitably ruin'd in the Loss of all I have on Earth, without you have good Nature enough to admit me to take Part of your Chariot.

Here the feigned widow ended her sorrowful tale, which had been several times interrupted by a parenthesis of sighs and groans, and Beauplaisir, with a complaisant and tender air, assured her of his readiness to serve her in things of much greater consequence than what she desired of him, and told her it would be an impossibility of denying a place in his chariot to a lady who he could not behold without yielding one in his heart. She answered the compliments he made her but with tears, which seemed to stream in such abundance from her eyes that she could not keep her handkerchief from her face one moment. Being come into the chariot, Beauplaisir said a thousand handsome things to persuade her from giving way to so violent a grief, which, he told her, would not only be destructive to her beauty, but likewise her health. But all his endeavours for consolation appeared ineffectual, and he began to think he should have but a dull journey in the company of one who seemed so obstinately devoted to the memory of her dead husband that there was no getting a word from her on any other theme. But, bethinking himself of the celebrated story of the Ephesian matron,¹ it came into his head to make trial whether she who seemed equally susceptible of sorrow might not also be so too of love. And, having begun a discourse on almost every other topic, and finding her still incapable of answering, he resolved to put it to the proof if this would have no more effect to rouse her sleeping spirits. With a gay air, therefore, though accompanied with the greatest modesty and respect, he turned the conversation, as though without design, on that joy-giving passion, and soon discovered that was indeed the subject she was best pleased to be entertained with. For, on his giving her a hint to begin upon, never any tongue run more voluble² than hers on the prodigious power it had to influence the souls of those possessed of it to actions even the most distant from their intentions, principles, or humours. From that she passed to a description of the happiness of mutual affection, the unspeakable ecstasy of those who meet with equal ardency, and represented it in colours so lively, and disclosed by the gestures (with which her words were accompanied) and the accent of her voice so true a feeling of what she said that Beauplaisir, without being as stupid as he was really the contrary, could not avoid perceiving there were seeds of fire not yet extinguished in this fair widow's soul, which wanted but the kindling breath of tender sighs to light into a blaze. He now thought himself as fortunate as some moments before he had the reverse, and doubted not but that before they parted he should find a way to dry the tears of this lovely mourner to the satisfaction of them both. He did not, however, offer, as he had done to Fantomina and Celia, to urge his passion directly to her, but by a thousand little softening artifices, which he well knew how to use, gave her leave to guess he was enamoured. When they came to the inn where they were to lie, he declared himself somewhat more freely and, perceiving she did not resent it past forgiveness, grew more encroaching still. He now took the liberty of kissing away her tears and catching the sighs as they issued from her lips; telling her if grief was infectious, he was resolved to have his share; protesting he would gladly exchange passions with her and be content to bear her load of sorrow, if she would as willingly ease the burden of his love. She said little in answer to the strenuous pressures with which at last he ventured to enfold her, but not thinking it decent for the character she had assumed to yield so suddenly, and unable to deny both his and her own inclinations, she counterfeited a fainting and fell motionless upon his breast. He had no great notion that she was in a real fit, and the room they supped in happening to have a bed in it, he took her in his arms and laid her on it, believing that whatever her distemper was, that was the most proper place to convey her to. He laid himself down by her and endeavoured to bring her to herself, and she was too grateful to her kind physician at her returning sense to remove from the posture he had put her in, without his leave.

It may perhaps seem strange that Beauplaisir should in such near intimacies continue still deceived. I know there are men who will swear it is an impossibility, and that no disguise could hinder them from knowing a woman they had once enjoyed. In answer to these scruples, I can only say that besides the alteration which the change of dress made in her, she was so admirably skilled in the art of feigning that she had the power of putting on almost what face she pleased, and knew so exactly how to form her behaviour to the character she represented that all the comedians at both playhouses³ are infinitely short of her performances. She could vary her very glances, tune her voice to accents the most different imaginable from those in which she spoke when she appeared herself. These aids from nature, joined to the wiles of art and the distance between the places where the imagined Fantomina and Celia were, might very well prevent his having any thought that they were the same, or that the fair widow was either of them. It never so much as entered his head, and, though he did fancy he observed in the face of the latter, features which were not altogether unknown to him, yet he could not recollect when or where he had known them. And, being told by her that from her birth she had never removed from Bristol, a place where he never was, he rejected the belief of having seen her and supposed his mind had been deluded by an idea of some other whom she might have a resemblance of.

¹ celebrated story ... matron From Petronius's Satyricon (first century CE). In the story, a widow, grieving the death of her husband, decides to starve herself to death in his tomb. She is discovered by a soldier, who seduces her.

² voluble Quickly and easily speaking.

³ comedians at both playhouses Actors in comedies at Drury Lane and Covent Garden, London's two major theaters.

They passed the time of their journey in as much happiness as the most luxurious gratification of wild desires could make them, and when they came to the end of it, parted not without a mutual promise of seeing each other often. He told her to what place she should direct a letter to him, and she assured him she would send to let him know where to come to her as soon as she was fixed in lodgings.

She kept her promise and, charmed with the continuance of his eager fondness, went not home but into private lodgings, whence she wrote to him to visit her the first opportunity and enquire for the widow Bloomer. She had no sooner dispatched this billet¹ than she repaired to the house where she had lodged as Fantomina, charging the people if Beauplaisir should come there, not to let him know she had been out of town. From thence she wrote to him, in a different hand, a long letter of complaint that he had been so cruel in not sending one letter to her all the time he had been absent, entreated to see him, and concluded with subscribing herself his unalterably affectionate Fantomina. She received in one day answers to both these. The first contained these lines:

To the charming Mrs. Bloomer

It would be impossible, my angel, for me to express the thousandth part of that infinity of transport the sight of your dear letter gave me. Never was woman formed to charm like you. Never did any look like you, write like you, bless like you; nor did ever man adore as I do. Since yesterday we parted, I have seemed a body without a soul, and had you not by this inspiring billet gave me new life, I know not what by tomorrow I should have been. I will be billet Letter.

with you this evening about five. O'tis an age till then! But the cursed formalities of duty oblige me to dine with my Lord, who never rises from table till that hour. Therefore, adieu till then, sweet lovely mistress of the soul and all the faculties of

Your most faithful,

BEAUPLAISIR.

The other was in this manner:

To the lovely FANTOMINA

If you were half so sensible as you ought of your own power of charming, you would be assured that to be unfaithful or unkind to you would be among the things that are in their very natures impossibilities. It was my misfortune, not my fault, that you were not persecuted every post with a declaration of my unchanging passion. But I had unluckily forgot the name of the woman at whose house you are, and knew not how to form a direction that it might come safe to your hands. And indeed, the reflection how you might misconstrue my silence brought me to town some weeks sooner than I intended. If you knew how I have languished to renew those blessings I am permitted to enjoy in your society, you would rather pity than condemn

Your ever faithful,

BEAUPLAISIR.

P.S. I fear I cannot see you till tomorrow; some business has unluckily fallen out that will engross my hours till then. Once more, my dear, adieu.

"Traitor!" cried she as soon as she had read them. "'Tis thus our silly, fond, believing sex are served when they put faith in man. So had I been deceived and cheated, had I like the rest believed, and sat down mourning in absence, and vainly waiting recovered tendernesses. How do some women," continued she, "make their life a hell, burning in fruitless expectations and dreaming out their days in hopes and fears, then wake at last to all the horror of despair? But I have outwitted even the most subtle of the deceiving kind, and while he thinks to fool me, he is himself the only beguiled person."

She made herself, most certainly, extremely happy in the reflection on the success of her stratagems and, while the knowledge of his inconstancy and levity of nature kept her from having that real tenderness for him she would else have had, she found the means of gratifying the inclination she had for his agreeable person in as full a manner as she could wish. She had all the sweets of love, but as yet had tasted none of the gall,¹ and was in a state of contentment which might be envied by the more delicate.

When the expected hour arrived, she found that her lover had lost no part of the fervency with which he had parted from her. But when the next day she received him as Fantomina, she perceived a prodigious difference, which led her again into reflections on the unaccountableness of men's fancies, who still prefer the last conquest only because it is the last. Here was an evident proof of it, for there could not be a difference in merit because they were the same person, but the widow Bloomer was a more new acquaintance than Fantomina, and therefore esteemed more valuable. This, indeed, must be said of Beauplaisir, that he had a greater share of good nature than most of his sex, who, for the most part, when they are weary of an intrigue, break it entirely off without any regard to the despair of the abandoned nymph.² Though he retained no more than a bare pity and complaisance for Fantomina, yet, believing she loved him to an excess, he would not entirely forsake her, though the continuance of his visits was now become rather a penance than a pleasure.

The widow Bloomer triumphed some time longer over the heart of this inconstant, but at length her sway was at an end, and she sunk in this character to the same degree of tastelessness³ as she had done before in that of Fantomina and Celia. She presently perceived it, but bore it as she had always done, it being but what she expected. She had prepared herself for it and had another project in embryo which she soon ripened into action. She did not, indeed, complete it altogether so suddenly as she had done the others, by reason there must be persons employed in it, and the aversion she had to any confidantes in her affairs, and the caution with which she had hitherto acted, and which she was still determined to continue, made it very difficult for her to find a way without breaking through that resolution to compass what she wished. She got over the difficulty at last, however, by proceeding in a manner if possible more extraordinary than all her former behaviour. Muffling herself up in her hood one day, she went into the park about the hour when there are a great many necessitous⁴ gentlemen who think themselves above doing what they call "little things for a maintenance" walking in the Mall⁵ to take a chameleon treat and fill their stomachs with air instead of meat.⁶ Two of those, who by their physiognomy⁷ she thought most proper for her purpose, she beckoned to come to her and, taking them into a walk more remote from company, began to communicate the business she had with them in these words: "I am sensible, Gentlemen," said she, "that, through the blindness of fortune and partiality of the world, merit frequently goes unrewarded, and that those of the best pretensions⁸ meet with the least encouragement. I ask your pardon," continued she, perceiving they seemed surprised, "if I am mistaken in the notion that you two may, perhaps, be of the number of those who have reason to complain of the injustice of fate. But if you are such as I take you for, I have a proposal to make you which may be of some little advantage to you." Neither of them made any immediate answer, but appeared buried in consideration for some moments. At length, "We should, doubtless, Madam," said one of them, "willingly come into any measures to oblige you, provided they are such as may bring us into no danger, either as to our persons or reputations." "That which I require of you," resumed she, "has nothing in it criminal. All that I desire is secrecy in what you are entrusted, and to disguise yourselves in such a manner as you cannot be known if hereafter seen by the person on whom you are to impose. In fine, the business is only an innocent frolic, but if blazed abroad,⁹ might be taken for too great a freedom in me. Therefore, if you resolve to assist me, here are five pieces to drink my health and assure you that I have not discoursed you on an affair I design not to proceed in. And when it is accomplished fifty more gall Bitterness.

nymph Desirable young woman.

¹ tastelessness Boringness.

⁴ necessitous Impoverished, in financial need.

the Mall Tree-lined promenade in St. James's Park, London.

⁶ to take ... meat Chameleons were thought to eat air rather than food.

⁷ physiognomy Physical features, especially considered as an indication of character.

⁸ pretensions Legitimate claims (i.e., to success).

blazed abroad Circulated broadly.

lie ready for your acceptance." These words and, above all, the money, which was a sum which 'tis probable they had not seen of a long time, made them immediately assent to all she desired and press for the beginning of their employment. But things were not yet ripe for execution, and she told them that the next day they should be let into the secret, charging them to meet her in the same place at an hour she appointed. 'Tis hard to say which of these parties went away best pleased—they, that fortune had sent them so unexpected a windfall, or she, that she had found persons who appeared so well qualified to serve her.

Indefatigable in the pursuit of whatsoever her humour was bent upon, she had no sooner left her new-engaged emissaries than she went in search of a house for the completing her project. She pitched on one very large and magnificently furnished, which she hired by the week, giving them the money beforehand to prevent any inquiries. The next day she repaired to the park, where she met the punctual 'squires of low degree, and, ordering them to follow her to the house she had taken, told them they must condescend to appear like servants, and gave each of them a very rich livery.¹ Then, writing a letter to Beauplaisir in a character vastly different from either of those she had made use of as Fantomina or the fair widow Bloomer, ordered one of them to deliver it into his own hands, to bring back an answer, and to be careful that he sifted out nothing of the truth. "I do not fear," said she, "that you should discover to him who I am, because that is a secret of which you yourselves are ignorant, but I would have you be so careful in your replies that he may not think the concealment springs from any other reasons than your great integrity to your trust. Seem, therefore, to know my whole affairs, and let your refusing to make him partaker in the secret appear to be only the effect of your zeal for my interest and reputation." Promises of entire fidelity on the one side and reward on the other being passed, the messenger made what haste he could to the house of Beauplaisir and, being there told where he might find him, performed exactly the injunction that had been given him. But never astonishment exceeding that which Beauplaisir felt at the reading this billet, in which he found these lines:

To the all-conquering Beauplaisir

I imagine not that 'tis a new thing to you to be told you are the greatest charm in nature to our sex. I shall, therefore, not to fill up my letter with any impertinent praises on your wit or person, only tell you that I am infinite in love with both and, if you have a heart not too deeply engaged, should think myself the happiest of my sex in being capable of inspiring it with some tenderness. There is but one thing in my power to refuse you, which is the knowledge of my name, which, believing the sight of my face will render no secret, you must not take it ill that I conceal from you. The bearer of this is a person I can trust. Send by him your answer, but endeavour not to dive into the meaning of this mystery, which will be impossible for you to unravel and at the same time very much disoblige me. But, that you may be in no apprehensions of being imposed on by a woman unworthy of your regard, I will venture to assure you the first and greatest men in the kingdom would think themselves blessed to have that influence over me you have, though unknown to yourself, acquired. But I need not go about to raise your curiosity by giving you any idea of what my person is. If you think fit to be satisfied, resolve to visit me tomorrow about three in the afternoon, and, though my face is hid, you shall not want sufficient demonstration that she who takes these unusual measures to commence a friendship with you is neither old nor deformed. Till then I am,

Yours,

INCOGNITA.

He had scarce come to the conclusion before he asked the person who brought it from what place he came, the name of the lady he served, if she were a wife or widow, and several other questions directly opposite to the directions of the letter. But silence would have availed him as much as did all those testimonies of curiosity. No *Italian bravo*² employed in a business of the like nature performed his office with more artifice,³

¹ livery Servant's uniform.

² bravo Mercenary or assassin.

³ artifice Craftiness.

and the impatient enquirer was convinced that nothing but doing as he was desired could give him any light into the character of the woman who declared so violent a passion for him. And, little fearing any consequence which could ensue from such an encounter, he resolved to rest satisfied till he was informed of everything from herself, not imagining this Incognita varied so much from the generality of her sex as to be able to refuse the knowledge of anything to the man she loved with that transcendancy of passion she professed, and which his many successes with the ladies gave him encouragement enough to believe. He therefore took pen and paper, and answered her letter in terms tender enough for a man who had never seen the person to whom he wrote. The words were as follows:

To the obliging and witty Incognita

Though to tell me I am happy enough to be liked by a woman such as by your manner of writing I imagine you to be is an honour which I can never sufficiently acknowledge, yet I know not how I am able to content myself with admiring the wonders of your wit alone. I am certain a soul like yours must shine in your eyes with a vivacity which must bless all they look on. I shall, however, endeavour to restrain myself in those bounds you are pleased to set me, till by the knowledge of my inviolable fidelity I may be thought worthy of gazing on that heaven I am now but to enjoy in contemplation. You need not doubt my glad compliance with your obliging summons. There is a charm in your lines which gives too sweet an idea of their lovely author to be resisted. I am all impatient for the blissful moment which is to throw me at your feet and give me an opportunity of convincing you that I am,

Your everlasting slave,

BEAUPLAISIR.

Nothing could be more pleased than she to whom it was directed at the receipt of this letter. But when she was told how inquisitive he had been concerning her character and circumstances, she could not forbear laughing heartily to think of the tricks she had played him and applauding her own strength of genius and force of resolution, which by such unthought-of ways could triumph over her lover's inconstancy and render that very temper which to other women is the greatest curse a means to make herself more blessed. "Had he been faithful to me," said she to herself, "either as Fantomina, or Celia, or the widow Bloomer, the most violent passion, if it does not change its object, in time will wither. Possession naturally abates the vigour of desire, and I should have had at best but a cold, insipid, husband-like lover in my arms. But by these arts of passing on him as a new mistress whenever the ardour (which alone makes love a blessing) begins to diminish for the former one, I have him always raving, wild, impatient, longing, dying. O that all neglected wives and fond abandoned nymphs would take this method! Men would be caught in their own snare and have no cause to scorn our easy, weeping, wailing sex!" Thus did she pride herself, as if secure she never should have any reason to repent the present gaiety of her humour. The hour drawing near in which he was to come, she dressed herself in as magnificent a manner as if she were to be that night at a ball at court, endeavouring to repair the want of those beauties which the vizard¹ should conceal by setting forth the others with the greatest care and exactness. Her fine shape and air and neck appeared to great advantage, and by that which was to be seen of her one might believe the rest to be perfectly agreeable. Beauplaisir was prodigiously charmed, as well with her appearance as with the manner she entertained him. But, though he was wild with impatience for the sight of a face which belonged to so exquisite a body, yet he would not immediately press for it, believing before he left her he should easily obtain that satisfaction. A noble collation being over, he began to sue for² the performance of her promise of granting everything he could ask, excepting the sight of her face and knowledge of her name. It would have been a ridiculous piece of affectation in her to have seemed coy in complying with what she herself had been the first in desiring. She yielded without even a show of reluctance. And if there be any true felicity in an amour such as theirs, both here enjoyed it to the full. But not in the height of all their mutual raptures could he prevail on her to satisfy his curiosity with the sight of her face. She told him that she hoped he knew so much of her as might serve to convince him she was not unworthy of his tenderest regard, and if he could not content himself with that which she was willing to reveal, and which was the conditions of their meeting, dear as he was to her she would rather part with him forever than consent to gratify an inquisitiveness which, in her opinion, had no business with his love. It was in vain that he endeavoured to make her sensible of her mistake and that this restraint was the greatest enemy imaginable to the happiness of them both. She was not to be persuaded, and he was obliged to desist his solicitations, though determined in his mind to compass what he so ardently desired before he left the house. He then turned the discourse wholly on the violence of the passion he had for her, and expressed the greatest discontent in the world at the apprehensions of being separated; swore he could dwell forever in her arms, and with such an undeniable earnestness pressed to be permitted to tarry with her the whole night that had she been less charmed with his renewed eagerness of desire, she scarce would have had the power of refusing him. But in granting this request she was not without a thought that he had another reason for making it besides the extremity of his passion, and had it immediately in her head how to disappoint him.

¹ vizard Mask.

² sue for Try to obtain.

The hours of repose being arrived, he begged she would retire to her chamber, to which she consented but obliged him to go to bed first, which he did not much oppose because he supposed she would not lie in her mask and doubted not but the morning's dawn would bring the wished discovery. The two imagined servants ushered him to his new lodging, where he lay some moments in all the perplexity imaginable at the oddness of this adventure. But she suffered not these cogitations to be of any long continuance. She came, but came in the dark, which, being no more than he expected by the former part of her proceedings, he said nothing of. But as much satisfaction as he found in her embraces, nothing ever longed for the approach of day with more impatience than he did. At last it came, but how great was his disappointment when, by the noises he heard in the street—the hurry of the coaches and the cries of penny-merchants¹—he was convinced it was night nowhere but with him? He was still in the same darkness as before, for she had taken care to blind the windows in such a manner that not the least chink was left to let in day. He complained of her behaviour in terms that she would not have been able to resist yielding to if she had not been certain it would have been the ruin of her passion. She therefore answered him only as she had done before and, getting out of the bed from him, flew out of the room with too much swiftness for him to have overtaken her if he had attempted it. The moment she left him, the two attendants entered the chamber and, plucking down the implements which had screened him from the knowledge of that which he so much desired to find out, restored his eyes once more to day. They attended to assist him in dressing, brought him tea, and by their obsequiousness let him see there was but one thing which the mistress of them would not gladly oblige him in. He was so much out of humour, however, at the disappointment of his curiosity that he resolved never to make a second visit. Finding her in an outer room, he made no scruple of expressing the sense he had of the little trust she reposed in him, and at last plainly told her he could not submit to receive obligations from a lady who thought him incapable of keeping a secret which she made no difficulty of letting her servants into. He resented; he once more entreated; he said all that man could do to prevail on her to unfold the mystery. But all his adjurations² were fruitless, and he went out of the house determined never to re-enter it till she should pay the price of his company with the discovery of her face and circumstances. She suffered him to go with this resolution and doubted not but he would recede from it when he reflected on the happy moments they had passed together. But if he did not, she comforted herself with the design of forming some other stratagem with which to impose on him a fourth time.

She kept the house and her gentlemen-equipage for about a fortnight, in which time she continued to write to him as Fantomina and the widow Bloomer, and received the visits he sometimes made to each. But his behaviour to both was grown so cold that she began to grow as weary of receiving his now insipid caresses as he was of offering them. She was beginning to think in what manner she should drop these two characters when the sudden arrival of her mother, who had been some time in a foreign country, obliged her to put an immediate stop to the course of her whimsical adventures. That lady, who was severely virtuous, did not approve of many things she had been told of the conduct of her daughter. And though it was not in the power of any person in the world to inform her of the truth of what she had been guilty of, yet she heard enough to make her keep her afterwards in a restraint little agreeable to her humour and the liberties to which she had been accustomed.

¹ penny-merchants Sellers offering cheap wares.

² adjurations Demands, pleas.

But this confinement was not the greatest part of the trouble of this now afflicted lady. She found the consequences of her amorous follies would be, without almost a miracle, impossible to be concealed: she was with child. And though she would easily have found means to have screened even this from the knowledge of the world had she been at liberty to have acted with the same unquestionable authority over herself as she did before the coming of her mother, yet now all her invention was at a loss for a stratagem to impose on a woman of her penetration.¹ By eating little, lacing prodigious strait, and the advantage of a great hoop-petticoat, however, her bigness was not taken notice of, and perhaps she would not have been suspected till the time of her going into the country, where her mother designed to send her and from whence she intended to make her escape to some place where she might be delivered with secrecy, if the time of it had not happened much sooner than she expected. A ball being at court, the good old lady was willing she should partake of the diversion of it as a farewell to the town. It was there she was seized with those pangs which none in her condition are exempt from. She could not conceal the sudden rack² which all at once invaded her, or, had her tongue been mute, her wildly rolling eyes, the distortion of her features, and the convulsions which shook her whole frame in spite of her would have revealed she laboured under some terrible shock of nature. Everybody was surprised; everybody was concerned; but few guessed at the occasion. Her mother grieved beyond expression, doubted not but she was struck with the hand of death, and ordered her to be carried home in a chair while herself followed in another. A physician was immediately sent for, but he, presently perceiving what was her distemper, called the old lady aside and told her it was not a doctor of his sex but one of her own her daughter stood in need of. Never was astonishment and horror greater than that which seized the soul of this afflicted parent at these words. She could not for a time believe the truth of what she heard, but he insisting on it and conjuring her to send for a midwife, she was at length convinced of it. All the pity and tenderness she had been for some moment before possessed of now vanished and were succeeded by an adequate shame and indignation. She flew to the bed where her daughter was lying and, telling her what she had been informed of and which she was now far from doubting, commanded her to reveal the name of the person whose insinuations had drawn her to this dishonour. It was a great while before she could be brought to confess anything, and much longer before she could be prevailed on to name the man whom she so fatally had loved. But the rack of nature growing more fierce, and the enraged old lady protesting no help should be afforded her while she persisted in her obstinacy, she, with great difficulty and hesitation in her speech, at last pronounced the name of Beauplaisir. She had no sooner satisfied her weeping mother than that sorrowful lady sent messengers at the same time for a midwife and for that gentleman who had occasioned the other's being wanted. He happened by accident to be at home and immediately obeyed the summons, though prodigiously surprised what business a lady so much a stranger to him could have to impart. But how much greater was his amazement when, taking him into her closet, she there acquainted him with her daughter's misfortune, of the discovery she had made, and how far he was concerned in it? All the idea one can form of wild astonishment was mean to what he felt. He assured her that the young lady her daughter was a person whom he had never more than at a distance admired, that he had indeed spoke to her in public company, but that he never had a thought which tended to her dishonour. His denials, if possible, added to the indignation she was before inflamed with. She had no longer patience and, carrying him into the chamber where she was just delivered of a fine girl, cried out, "I will not be imposed on. The truth by one of you shall be revealed." Beauplaisir, being brought to the bedside, was beginning to address himself to the lady in it to beg she would clear the mistake her mother was involved in, when she, covering herself with the clothes and ready to die a second time with the inward agitations of her soul, shrieked out, "Oh, I am undone! I cannot live and bear this shame!" But the old lady, believing that now or never was the time to dive into the bottom of this mystery, forcing her to rear her head, told her she should not hope to escape the scrutiny of a parent she had dishonoured in such a manner and, pointing to Beauplaisir, "Is this the gentleman," said she, "to whom you owe your ruin? Or have you deceived me by a fictitious tale?"

¹ penetration Perceptiveness.

² rack Convulsion of pain.

"Oh no!" resumed the trembling creature, "He is indeed the innocent cause of my undoing. Promise me your pardon," continued she, "and I will relate the means." Here she ceased, expecting what she would reply, which, on hearing Beauplaisir cry out, "What mean you, Madam? I your undoing, who never harboured the least design on you in my life?" she did in these words: "Though the injury you have done your family," said she, "is of a nature which cannot justly hope forgiveness, yet be assured, I shall much sooner excuse you when satisfied of the truth than while I am kept in a suspense if possible as vexatious as the crime¹ itself is to me." Encouraged by this, she related the whole truth. And 'tis difficult to determine if Beauplaisir or the lady were most surprised at what they heard—he, that he should have been blinded so often by her artifices, or she, that so young a creature should have the skill to make use of them. Both sat for some time in a profound reverie, till at length she broke it first in these words: "Pardon, Sir," said she, "the trouble I have given you. I must confess it was with a design to oblige you to repair the supposed injury you had done this unfortunate girl by marrying her, but now I know not what to say. The blame is wholly hers, and I have nothing to request further of you than that you will not divulge the distracted folly she has been guilty of." He answered her in terms perfectly polite, but made no offer of that which perhaps she expected, though could not, now informed of her daughter's proceedings, demand. He assured her, however, that if she would commit the new-born lady to his care, he would discharge it faithfully. But neither of them would consent to that, and he took his leave, full of cogitations more confused than ever he had known in his whole life. He continued to visit there to enquire after her health every day, but the old lady perceiving there was nothing likely to ensue from these civilities but perhaps a renewing of the crime, she entreated him to refrain, and as soon as her daughter was in a condition, sent her to a monastery in France, the abbess of which had been her particular friend. And thus ended an intrigue which, considering the time it lasted, was as full of variety as any, perhaps, that many ages has produced.

—1725

IN CONTEXT

The Eighteenth-Century Sexual Imagination

from A Present for a Servant-Maid (1743)

Eliza Haywood wrote extensively on romantic and sexual themes not only in her fiction and drama but also in a variety of nonfictional prose contexts. Among the most interesting of these works is A Present for a Servant-Maid, which was published anonymously in 1743. It went through several editions and was widely imitated. The work presents advice for young female servants and devotes a considerable amount of attention to the difficulties they are likely to face at the hands of the gentlemen in the households in which they work.

Dear Girls,

I think there cannot be a greater service done to the commonwealth (of which you are a numerous body) than to lay down some general rules for your behaviour, which, if observed, will make your condition as happy to yourselves as it is necessary to others. Nothing can be more melancholy than to hear continual complaints for faults which a very little reflection would render it almost as easy for you to avoid as to commit; most of the mistakes laid to your charge proceeding at first only from a certain indolence and inactivity of the mind, but, if not rectified in time, become habitual and difficult to be thrown off.

As the first step therefore towards being happy in service, you should never enter into a place¹ but with a view of staying in it; to which end I think it highly necessary that (as no mistress worth serving will take you without a character²) you should also make some enquiry into the place before you suffer yourself to be hired. There are some houses which appear well by day, that it would be little safe for a modest maid to sleep in at night. I do not mean those coffeehouses, bagnios, &c. which some parts of the town, particularly Covent Garden,³ abounds with; for in those the very aspect of the persons who keep them are sufficient to show what manner of trade they follow. But houses which have no public show of business, are richly furnished, and where the mistress has an air of the strictest modesty, and perhaps affects a double purity of behaviour, yet under such roofs, and under the sanction of such women as I have described, are too frequently acted such scenes of debauchery as would startle even the owners of some common brothels. Great regard is therefore to be had to the character of the persons who recommend you, and the manner in which you heard of the place; for those sort of people have commonly their emissaries at inns, watching the coming in of the wagons, and, if they find any pretty girls who come to town to go to service, presently hire them in the name of some person of condition, and by this means the innocent young creature, while she thanks God for her good fortune in being so immediately provided for, is ensnared into the service of the Devil. Here temptations of all kinds are offered her; she is not treated as a servant but a guest; her country habit is immediately stripped off, and a gay modish one put on in the stead; and then the designed victim, willing or unwilling, is exposed to sale to the first lewd supporter of her mistress's grandeur that comes to the house. If she refuses the shameful business for which she was hired, and prefers the preservation of her virtue to all the promises can be made her, which way can she escape? She is immediately confined, close watched, threatened, and at last forced to compliance. Then, by a continued prostitution withered in her bloom, she becomes despised, no longer affords any advantage to the wretch who betrayed her, and is turned out to infamy and beggary, perhaps too with the most loathsome of all diseases, which ends her miserable days in an hospital or workhouse, in case she can be admitted, though some have not had even that favour, but found their deathbed on a dunghill.

... This town at present abounds with such variety of allurements that a young heart cannot be too much upon its guard. It is those expensive ones, I mean, which drain your purse as well as waste your time: such as plays, the Wells,⁴ and gardens, and other public shows and entertainments; places which it becomes nobody to be seen often at, and more especially young women in your station. All things that are invented merely for the gratification of luxury, and are of no other service than temporary delight, ought to be shunned by those who have their bread to get. Nor is it any excuse for you that a friend gives you tickets and it costs you nothing; it costs you at least what is more precious than money—your time; not only what you pass in seeing the entertainments, but what the idea and memory of them will take up. They are a kind of delicious poison to the mind, which pleasingly intoxicates and destroys all relish for any thing beside. If you could content yourselves with one sight and no more of any, or even all, these shows, or could you answer that they would engross your

¹ place Position (of employment).

² character I.e., a letter of character reference.

³ Covent Garden Where many brothels were located.

⁴ the Wells Several locations of popular springs, such as Epsom Wells and Lambeth Wells, also offered other entertainments, such as gambling or concerts, in addition to their spas.

thoughts no longer than while you were spectators, the curiosity might be excusable. But it rarely happens that you have this command over yourselves; the music, the dances, the gay clothes and scenes make too strong an impression on the senses not to leave such traces behind as are entirely inconsistent either with good housewifery or the duties of your place. Avoid, therefore, such dangerous amusements....

Temptations from your Master: Being so much under his command, and obliged to attend him at any hour and at any place he is pleased to call you will lay you under difficulties to avoid his importunities, which it must be confessed are not easy to surmount; yet a steady resolution will enable you; and as a vigorous resistance is less to be expected in your station, your persevering may, perhaps, in time oblige him to desist and acknowledge you have more reason than himself: it is a duty, however, owing to yourself to endeavour it.

Behaviour to him, if a single man: If he happens to be a single man, and is consequently under less restraint, be as careful as you can, opportunities will not be wanting to prosecute his aim; and, as you cannot avoid hearing what he says, must humbly, and in the most modest terms you can, remonstrate to him the sin and shame he would involve you in; and omit nothing to make him sensible how cruel it is to go about to betray a person whom it is his duty to protect. Add that nothing shall ever prevail on you to forfeit your virtue; and take care that all your looks and gestures correspond with what you say: let no wanton smile or light coquette air give him room to suspect you are not so much displeased with the inclination he has for you as you would seem; for if he once imagines you deny but for the sake of form, it will the more inflame him, and render him more pressing than ever. Let your answers, therefore, be delivered with the greatest sedateness. Show that you are truly sorry, and more ashamed than vain that he finds anything in you to like. ...

If a married man: Greater caution is still to be observed if he is a married man. As soon as he gives you the least intimation of his design, either by word or action, you ought to keep as much as possible out of his way in order to prevent his declaring himself more plainly; and if, in spite of all your care, he find an opportunity of telling you his mind, you must remonstrate the wrong he would do his wife, and how much he demeans both himself and her by making such an offer to his own servant. If this is ineffectual and he continues to persecute you still, watching you wherever you go, both abroad and at home, and is so troublesome in his importunities that you cannot do your business quietly and regularly, your only way then is to give warning; but be very careful not to let your mistress know the motive of it. That is a point too tender to be touched upon even in the most distant manner, much less plainly told. Such a discovery would not only give her an infinite uneasiness (for in such cases the innocent suffer for the crimes of the guilty), but turn the inclination your master had for you into the extremest hatred. He may endeavour to clear himself by throwing the odium on you, for those who are unjust in one thing will be so in others; and you cannot expect that he who does not scruple to wrong his wife, and indeed his own soul, will make any to take away your reputation, when he imagines his own will be secured by it. He may pretend you threw yourself in his way when he was in liquor, or that, having taken notice of some indecencies in your carriage, and suspecting you were a loose creature, he had only talked a little idly to you as a trial how you would behave; and that it was because he did not persist as you expected, and offer you money, that you had made the discovery—partly out of malice, and partly to give yourself an air of virtue. But though he should not be altogether so unjust and cruel, nor allege any thing of this kind against you, it would be a thing which you never ought to forgive yourself for, if by any imprudent hint you gave occasion for a breach of that amity and confidence which is the greatest blessing of the married state, and when once dissolved, continual jarring and mutual discontent are the unfailing consequence.

from Venus in the Cloister; or, The Nun in Her Smock (1725)

At the end of Fantomina Haywood refers to the heroine being sent “to a monastery in France.” For eighteenth-century readers, such a reference would almost certainly have carried with it connotations of debauchery; sexual activities in French nunneries were a frequent topic in the erotic fiction of the period. One of the best-known examples is Vénus dans le cloître, ou la Religieuse en chemise, a French pornographic novel originally printed in 1683 and translated into English as Venus in the Cloister in 1725. The following excerpt is related by Angelica, a 20-year-old nun; she is discussing the activities of Eugenia, another woman in the same nunnery.

Angel. I'll tell thee: I thought I saw one of the workmen enter her cell, and, tripping softly along the dormitory, I made up to her door, which having a large chink between the boards, I saw what I tell you. The first thing I beheld was Eugenia all naked with Frederick sitting by her, holding in his hand — which extremely surprised me, imagining to myself that she could never enjoy the excess of pleasure I afterwards found she did.

Said I to myself, “Lord! what pain must poor Eugenia undergo? How is it possible he should not tear her to pieces?” These were my thoughts, but I suppose he treated her very gently on account of her youth, for she was but bare fifteen. While I was thus busied in my thoughts, I heard Frederick say, “Eugenia, my dear, turn upon your back;” which after she had done, he got up and put his — into her—for my part I was quite frightened when I heard her cry out as if she were in excessive pain. This gave me, as thou may'st well imagine, a great deal of uneasiness, for I did not dare to come in for fear of surprising of them, which might have had perhaps but very ill consequences. However, a moment after I saw her move her legs and embrace her lover with both her arms after such an extraordinary manner as sufficiently expressed the utmost satisfaction.

Frederick was no less pleased with this encounter. “Ha!” said he, “what pleasure does thou give me!” In short, after endeavouring to exceed each other in the amorous combat, they softly sighed, and then for some small space reposed as in an ecstasy. And to show thee what love Eugenia had for her lover, I must tell thee that, notwithstanding this pleasing trance, she could not help now and then giving him many a kiss, nay, I think she kissed him all over, and spoke to him the kindest things in the world, which sufficiently convinced me what excess of joy she then received. This raised a desire in me to taste the same love potion, and indeed I even grew distracted with strong unknown longings and desires. I could not help thinking of it all night, and slept not a moment till the morning, and, by a lucky accident, fortune, who favoured my desires, gave me some consolation.

PRINT CULTURE, STAGE CULTURE

CONTEXTS

With the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660 came the reopening of the theater, in whatever buildings could be found, and Charles II's issue of licenses for two playhouses and companies. The major innovations were the proscenium arch (though much action still took place on an apron stage in front of the curtain), movable scenery, and women instead of boys playing the female roles. The new stage scenery took the form of painted flats trundled on and off in grooves in the stage, so that successive scenes—say, in the park, in the street, and indoors—would each be visually represented instead of entirely imagined by the audience. Theater managers sought increasingly ornate, complex scenery to accompany their productions. This was especially so for tragedy, which was often set in exotic locations and extreme circumstances, unlike comedy, which represented the life and society known by experience to the spectators. Updated versions of old plays were popular, and writers assumed a free hand in reshaping the originals. One of the era's most popular productions was Poet Laureate Nahum Tate's version of Shakespeare's King Lear, which held the stage for 150 years after its first performance in 1681, after the original had twice been revived unsuccessfully. The excerpt of Tate's Lear reprinted here gives a sense of the ways in which Tate changed the original text. While in the parallel scene in Shakespeare's Lear, Cordelia is executed after she and Lear are captured, and Lear then dies of grief, here both characters live and see their kingdom restored. Tate also removed the role of the Fool from the play entirely and undercut the character of Cordelia by having her fall in love with Edgar at the opening of the action, so that she has less to lose in defying her father, and acts largely in the interests of her future husband. Tate's Lear affirms that, even in the face of enormous adversity, "truth and virtue shall succeed at last." When Cordelia says, "Then there are gods, and virtue is their care," she is asserting precisely the kind of belief that is at least temporarily shaken by Shakespeare's play.

Restoration audiences liked to see good triumph in their tragedies and rightful government restored. In comedy they liked to see the love-lives of the young and fashionable, with a central couple bringing their courtship to a successful conclusion (often overcoming the opposition of their elders to do so). Heroines had to be chaste, but were independent-minded and outspoken; now that they were played by women, there was more mileage for the playwright in disguising them in men's clothes or giving them narrow escapes from rape. Heroes were generally anything but chaste, and sowed their wild oats in plenty before declaring their love to the heroine. To non-theater-goers these comedies were widely seen as licentious and morally suspect, holding up the antics of a small, privileged, and decadent class for admiration. This same class dominated the audiences of Restoration theater—groups of men, and women escorted by men attended, and Colley Cibber (actor, dramatist, theater manager, and later Poet Laureate) notes below, some women wore masks to the theater so that their reaction to bawdy or irrereligious language or to overtly sexual scenes could not be observed.

Many middle-class people disapproved of the theater as a playground for the dissipated and irrereligious upper classes. Of these, some wanted reform, and others wanted outright suppression. One of the most vociferous objectors to the theater was Jeremy Collier (1650–1726), a clergyman whose pamphlet A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, excerpted here, attacks writers such as William Congreve, William Wycherley, and John Dryden for their characters' sexual freedom and profane dialogue, and for bringing women and especially clergymen into disrespect. While Collier's Short View sparked many replies (particularly from those, such as Congreve, whom he had singled out) and much heated debate, he continued to voice his opinions in a series of pamphlets in the next decade: A Defense of the Short View (1698), A Second Defense of the Short View (1700), A Dissuasive from the Playhouse (1703), and A Further Vindication of the Short View (1707).

The excerpt below from a Spectator article by Joseph Addison describes the rise in England of what became another form of theater popular among the upper classes, the opera. This new genre, imported from Italy, received mixed reactions in eighteenth-century England. Many were delighted by the music, the star system among the singers, and the elaborate and expensive settings, but others could not understand the appeal of a libretto written in a language incomprehensible to its audience.

During the 1730s the theater became an important vehicle for political satire. John Gay and Henry Fielding set out to attack the government through stage works that proved highly popular. Robert Walpole's government responded to this challenge with the Licensing Act of 1737, the legal language of which is excerpted here. This decreed that all plays were subject to censorship by the office of the Lord Chamberlain, which had to pre-approve anything that would be acted. The act also re-stated the monopoly of the two licensed (or "patent") theaters, Drury Lane and Covent Garden. Both before and after the Act some venues circumvented this decree with illegitimate performances of burlettas, or by adding music to plays and charging admission for the music, rather than for the play. But for the moment the Licensing Act tightened up enforcement, through inspectors who would patrol London to ensure the law was not being broken. Although the Patent Act that limited theater numbers was dropped in 1843, the Lord Chamberlain retained the function of censoring plays until 1968, and movies are still licensed for public showing in most jurisdictions.

While the Licensing Act made life harder for playwrights, the Statute of Anne (1710) was designed to clarify the position of the industry of printing and bookselling (as "publishing" was then generally called). This statute, considered to be the first piece of copyright legislation, both established the "sole right and liberty" of booksellers and printers to sell the new works they had issued, and appeared to place a clear limit (in most cases, 14 years) on that right. In practice (as discussed in the general introduction to this period), it was not until the decision of the House of Lords in Donaldson v. Beckett in 1774, that the 14-year limit became a reality. Samuel Johnson's comments on the latter, recorded in Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson, suggest some of its subsequent effects on the book trade.

The next two excerpts given below are responses to the proliferation of other forms of printed material in the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In Tatler number 224 Joseph Addison comments on the growth of the advertising industry, while Samuel Johnson, in an article from his Idler, gives a disparaging view of the standards of reporting in England's weekly papers (of which, in 1760, there were over 150).

During this period women began to make up a significant percentage of the nation's numerous writers. Clara Reeve's The Progress of Romance (1785) was the first literary history of what we now call the novel. The excerpt chosen contains her discussion of three of the most notorious women writers of previous generations: Aphra Behn, Delarivier Manley, and Eliza Haywood. Since the time of their writing (especially that of Behn), fiction, like the stage, had acquired different conventions and become more frequently didactic. The excerpt chosen from Reeve reflects the way comment on women's writing tended to slide into comment on their lives, but her championship of Behn is remarkable given that by this date Behn was generally regarded as disreputable and her work corrupting.

James Lackington, a self-educated bookseller known for his commitment to selling books at the cheapest possible prices, estimated in 1792 that the reading public had quadrupled in the previous twenty years. In this excerpt from his Memoirs, he celebrates the increase in reading among women and "the lower classes of the community," and applauds booksellers (that is, publishers) as advancers of knowledge.

As the final passage in this section demonstrates, the eighteenth century's political climate was highly charged. The press in Britain had greater freedom than it did in absolute monarchies like that of France, or religious governments like that of colonial Massachusetts, but any work considered offensive or politically dangerous could be censored under the law of Seditious Libel. Daniel Defoe, Delarivier Manley, and Thomas Paine were among those charged with libel during the period; publishers, however, generally took the brunt of the blame for the production of such works, as is evident in the excerpt below of the trial of Paine's publisher, Thomas Williams.

from Nahum Tate, The History of King Lear
(1681)

from ACT 5

(Scene, a prison.)

... (Kent brought in.)

LEAR. Who are you?
My eyes are none o' th' best, I'll tell you straight;
Oh Albany! Well, sir, we are your captives,
And you are come to see death pass upon us.
5 Why this delay? Or is 't your Highness' pleasure
To give us first the torture? Say ye so?
Why here's old Kent and I, as tough a pair
As e'er bore tyrant's stroke—but my Cordelia,
My poor Cordelia here, O pity!
10 ALBANY. Take off their chains. Though injured Majesty,
The Wheel of Fortune now has made her circle,
And blessings yet stand 'twixt thy grave and thee.
LEAR. Com'st though, inhuman Lord, to sooth us back
To a fool's paradise of hope, to make 15 Our doom more wretched? Go to,¹ we are too well Acquainted with misfortune to be gulled^o deceived
With lying hope; no, we will hope no more.
ALBANY. I have a tale t'unfold so full of wonder
As cannot meet an easy faith;
20 But by that Royal injured head 'tis true.
KENT. What would your Highness?
ALBANY. Know the noble Edgar Impeached Lord Edmund since the fight, of treason,
And dared him for the proof to fight combat,

25 In which the gods confirmed his charge by conquest;
I left ev'n now the traitor wounded mortally.
LEAR. And whither ends this story?
ALBANY. E'er they fought
Lord Edgar gave into my hands this paper,
30 A blacker scroll of treason, and of lust,
Than can be found in the records of Hell;
There, sacred sir, behold the characters
Of Goneril, the worst of daughters, but
More vicious wife.
35 CORDELIA. Could there be yet addition to their guilt?
What will not they that wrong a father do?
ALBANY. Since then my injuries, Lear, fall in with thine:
I have resolved the same redress for both.
KENT. What says my Lord?
40 CORDELIA. Speak, for me thought I heard
The charming voice of a descending god.
ALBANY. The troops by Edmund raised, I have disbanded;
Those that remain are under my command.
What comfort may be brought to cheer your age
45 And heal your savage wrongs, shall be applied;
For to your Majesty we do resign
Your kingdom, save what part yourself conferred
On us in marriage.
KENT. Hear you that, my liege?
50 CORDELIA. Then there are gods, and virtue is their care.
LEAR. Is't possible?
Let the spheres stop their course, the sun make halt,
The winds be hushed, the seas and fountains rest;
All nature pause, and listen to the change.
55 Where is my Kent, my Cajas?²
KENT. Here, my liege.

¹ Go to Come on.

² Cajas I.e., Caius. Kent had assumed the name of Caius while he was disguised.

LEAR. Why, I have news that will recall thy youth;
Ha! Didst thou hear't, or did th'inspiring gods Whisper to me alone? Old Lear shall be A king again.

KENT. The Prince, that like a god has power, has said it.

LEAR. Cordelia then shall be a queen, mark that:
Cordelia shall be queen; winds catch the sound
And bear it on your rosy wings to heaven.
Cordelia is a queen.

(Re-enter Edgar with Gloucester.)

ALBANY. Look, Sir, where pious Edgar comes Leading his eye-less father: O my liege!
His wondrous story will deserve your leisure:
What he has done and suffered for your sake,
What for the fair Cordelia's.

GLOUCESTER. Where is my liege? Conduct me to his knees to hail

His second birth of empire; my dear Edgar
Has, with himself, revealed the King's blest restoration.

LEAR. My poor dark Gloucester.

GLOUCESTER. O let me kiss that once more sceptred hand!

LEAR. Hold, thou mistak'st the Majesty, kneel here;
Cordelia has our pow'r, Cordelia's queen.

Speak, is not that the noble suffering Edgar?

GLOUCESTER. My pious son, more dear than my lost eyes.

LEAR. I wronged him too, but here's the fair amends.

EDGAR. Your leave, my liege, for an unwelcome message.

Edmund (but that's a trifle) is expired;
What more will touch you, your imperious daughters
Goneril and haughty Regan, both are dead,
Each by the other poisoned at a banquet;
This, dying, they confessed.

CORDELIA. O fatal period of ill-governed life!

LEAR. Ungrateful as they were, my heart feels yet
A pang of nature for their wretched fall—

But, Edgar, I defer thy joys too long:
Thou serv'dst distressed Cordelia; take her crowned:
Th'imperial grace fresh blooming on her brow;
Nay, Gloucester, thou hast here a father's right;
Thy helping hand t'heap blessings on their head.

KENT. Old Kent throws in his hearty wishes too.

EDGAR. The gods and you too largely recompence
What I have done; the gift strikes merit dumb.

CORDELIA. Nor do I blush to own my self o'er-paid
For all my sufferings past.

GLOUCESTER. Now, gentle gods, give Gloucester his discharge.

LEAR. No, Gloucester, thou hast business yet for life;
Thou, Kent, and I, retired to some cool cell
Will gently pass our short reserves of time
In calm reflections on our fortunes past,
Cheered with relation of the prosperous reign
Of this celestial pair; thus our remains
Shall in an even course of thought be past,
Enjoy the present hour, nor fear the last.

EDGAR. Our drooping country now erects her head,

Peace spreads her balmy wings, and plenty blooms.

Divine Cordelia, all the gods can witness

How much thy love to Empire I prefer!

Thy bright example shall convince the world

(Whatever storms of fortune are decreed)

That truth and virtue shall at last succeed.

*(Exeunt Omnes.)*¹

from Colley Cibber, An Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber (1740)

... But while our authors took these extraordinary liberties with their wit, I remember the ladies were then observed to be decently afraid of venturing bare-faced to a new comedy, 'till they had been assured they might do it without the risk of an insult to their modesty—or, if their curiosity were too strong for their patience, they took care, at least, to save appearances, and rarely came upon the first days of acting but in masks (then daily worn, and admitted in the pit, the side boxes, and gallery), which custom, however, had so many ill consequences attending it, that it has been abolished these many years.²

¹ Exeunt Omnes Latin: Exit all.

² masks ... years Masks came to denote prostitutes.

from Jeremy Collier, A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1698)

INTRODUCTION

The business of plays is to recommend virtue and discountenance vice; to show the uncertainty of human greatness, the sudden turns of fate, and the unhappy conclusions of violence and injustice; 'tis to expose the singularities of pride and fancy, to make folly and falsehood contemptible, and to bring everything that is ill under infamy and neglect. This design has been oddly pursued by the English stage. Our poets write with a different view and are gone into another interest. 'Tis true, were their intentions fair, they might be serviceable to this purpose. They have in a great measure the springs of thought and inclination in their power. Show, music, action, and rhetoric are moving entertainments; and, rightly employed, would be very significant. But force and motion are things indifferent, and the use lies chiefly in the application. These advantages are now in the enemy's hand and under a very dangerous management. Like cannon seized, they are pointed the wrong way; and by the strength of the defense, the mischief is made the greater. That this complaint is not unreasonable I shall endeavor to prove by showing the misbehavior of the stage with respect to morality and religion. Their liberties in the following particulars are intolerable, viz.,¹ their smuttiness of expression; their swearing, profaneness, and lewd application of Scripture; their abuse of the clergy, their making their top characters libertines and giving them success in their debauchery. This charge, with some other irregularities, I shall make good against the stage and show both the novelty and scandal of the practice. And, first, I shall begin with the rankness and indecency of their language. . . .

from CHAPTER I: THE IMMODESTY OF THE STAGE

... To argue the matter more at large.

Smuttiness is a fault in behavior as well as in religion. 'Tis a very coarse diversion, the entertainment of those who are generally least both in sense and station. The looser part of the mob have no true relish of decency and honor, and want education and thought to furnish out a genteel conversation. Barrenness of fancy makes them often take up with those scandalous liberties. A vicious imagination may blot a great deal of paper at this rate with ease enough. And 'tis possible convenience may sometimes invite to the expedient. The modern poets seem to use smut as the old ones did machines,² to relieve a fainting invention. When Pegasus³ is jaded and would stand still, he is apt like other tits⁴ to run into every puddle.

Obscenity in any company is a rustic, uncreditable talent, but among women 'tis particularly rude. Such talk would be very affrontive in conversation and not endured by any lady of reputation. Whence, then, comes it to pass that those liberties which disoblige so much in conversation should entertain upon the stage? Do women leave all the regards to decency and conscience behind them when they come to the playhouse? Or does the place transform their inclinations and turn their former aversions into pleasure? Or were their pretenses to sobriety elsewhere nothing but hypocrisy and grimace? Such suppositions as these are all satire and invective. They are rude imputations upon the whole sex. To treat the ladies with such stuff is no better than taking their money to abuse them. It supposes their imagination vicious and their memories ill-furnished, that they are practiced in the language of the stews⁵ and pleased with the scenes of brutishness. When at the same time the customs of education and the laws of decency are so very cautious and reserved in regard to women—I say so very reserved—that 'tis almost a fault for them to understand they are ill-used. They can't discover their disgust without disadvantage, nor blush without disservice to their modesty. To appear with any skill in such cant looks as if they had fallen upon ill conversation or managed their curiosity amiss. In a word, he that treats the ladies with such discourse must conclude either that they like it or they do not. To machines Moveable contrivances for the production of effects.

Pegasus Winged horse of the gods.

tits Small or low-grade horses; nags.

⁵ stews Brothels.

¹ viz. Abbreviation of Latin word "videlicet," meaning "that is to say."

suppose the first is a gross reflection upon their virtue. And as for the latter case, it entertains them with their own aversion, which is ill-nature, and ill-manners enough in all conscience. And in this particular custom and conscience, the forms of breeding and the maxims of religion are on the same side. In other instances vice is often too fashionable. But here a man can't be a sinner without being a clown.¹

In this respect the stage is faulty to a scandalous degree of nauseousness and aggravation. For:

The poets make women speak smuttily. Of this the places before-mentioned are sufficient evidence, and if there was occasion they might be multiplied to a much greater number. Indeed the comedies are seldom clear of these blemishes. And sometimes you have them in tragedy. ...

They represent their single ladies and persons of condition under these disorders of liberty. This makes the irregularity still more monstrous and a greater contradiction to Nature and probability. But rather than not be vicious, they will venture to spoil a character. ...

They have oftentimes not so much as the poor refuge of a double meaning to fly to. So that you are under a necessity either of taking ribaldry or nonsense. And when the sentence has two handles, the worst is generally turned to the audience. The matter is so contrived that the smut and scum of the thought now arises uppermost, and, like a picture drawn to sight, looks always upon the company.

And which is still more extraordinary, the prologues and epilogues are sometimes scandalous to the last degree. ... Now here, properly speaking, the actors quit the stage and remove from fiction into life. Here they converse with the boxes and pit and address directly to the audience. These preliminary and concluding parts are designed to justify the conduct of the play, and bespeak the favor of the company. Upon such occasions one would imagine, if ever, the ladies should be used with respect and the measures of decency observed. But here we have lewdness without shame or example. Here the poet exceeds himself. Here are such strains as would turn the stomach of an ordinary debauchee and be almost nauseous in the stews. And to make it the more agreeable, women are commonly picked out for this service. Thus the poet courts the good opinion of the audience. This is the dessert he regales the ladies with at the close of the entertainment. It seems, he thinks, they have admirable palates! Nothing can be a greater breach of manners than such liberties as these. If a man would study to outrage quality and virtue, he could not do it more effectually. But:

Smut is still more insufferable with respect to religion. The heathen religion was in a great measure a mystery of iniquity. Lewdness was consecrated in the temples as well as practiced in the stews. Their deities were great examples of vice and worshipped with their own inclination. 'Tis no wonder therefore their poetry should be tinctured with their belief, and that the stage should borrow some of the liberties of their theology. This made Mercury's procuring and Jupiter's adultery the more passable in Amphitryon.² Upon this score, Gimnasium is less monstrous in praying the gods to send her store of gallants. And thus Chaerea defends his adventure by the precedent of Jupiter and Danae. But the Christian religion is quite of another complexion. Both its precepts and authorities are the highest discouragement to licentiousness. It forbids the remotest tendencies to evil, banishes the follies of conversation, and obliges us to sobriety of thought. That which might pass for raillery and entertainment in heathenism is detestable in Christianity. The restraint of the precept and the quality of the Deity and the expectations of futurity quite alter the case. ...

from CHAPTER 4: THE STAGE-POETS MAKE THEIR PRINCIPAL PERSONS VICIOUS AND REWARD THEM AT THE END OF THE PLAY

... Indeed, to make delight the main business of comedy is an unreasonable and dangerous principle, opens the way to all licentiousness, and confounds the distinction between mirth and madness. For if diversion is the chief end, it must be had at any price. No serviceable expedient must be refused, though never so scandalous. And thus the worst things are said, and the best abused;

¹ clown Oaf.

² Amphitryon Play by third-century BCE Roman comic playwright Plautus. Collier also refers here to plays by Roman comic playwright Terence (second century BCE).

religion is insulted, and the most serious matters turned into ridicule! As if the blind side of an audience ought to be caressed, and their folly and atheism entertained in the first place. Yes, if the palate is pleased, no matter though the body is poisoned! For can one die of an easier disease than diversion? But raillery apart, certainly mirth and laughing without respect to the cause are not such supreme satisfactions! A man has sometimes pleasure in losing his wits. Frenzy and possession will shake the lungs and brighten the face; and yet I suppose they are not much to be coveted. However, now we know the reason of the profaneness and obscenity of the stage, of their hellish cursing and swearing, and in short of their great industry to make God and goodness contemptible. 'Tis all to satisfy the company and make people laugh! A most admirable justification. What can be more engaging to an audience than to see a poet thus atheistically brave? To see him charge up to the cannon's mouth and defy the vengeance of Heaven to serve them? Besides, there may be somewhat of convenience in the case. To fetch diversion out of innocence is no such easy matter. There's no succeeding, it may be, in this method, without sweat and drudging. Clean wit, inoffensive humour, and handsome contrivance require time and thought. And who would be at this expense when the purchase is so cheap another way? 'Tis possible a poet may not always have sense enough by him for such an occasion. And since we are upon supposals, it may be the audience is not to be gained without straining a point and giving a loose to conscience. And when people are sick, are they not to be humoured? In fine, we must make them laugh, right or wrong, for delight is the chief end of comedy. Delight! He should have said debauchery. That's the English of the word and the consequence of the practice. But the original design of comedy was otherwise. And granting it was not so, what then? If the ends of things were naught,¹ they must be mended. Mischief is the chief end of malice, would it be then a blemish in ill nature to change temper and relent into goodness? The chief end of a madman, it may be, is to fire a house; must we not therefore bind him in his bed? To conclude. If delight without restraint or distinction, without conscience or shame, is the supreme law of comedy, 'twere well if we had less on't. Arbitrary pleasure is more dangerous than arbitrary power. Nothing is more brutal than to be abandoned to appetite; and nothing more wretched than to serve in such a design. . . .

from Joseph Addison, The Spectator No. 18 (21 March 1711)

... Equitis quoque jam migravit ab aure voluptas
*Omnis ad incertos oculos & gaudia vana.*²

—HORACE

It is my design in this paper to deliver down to posterity a faithful account of the Italian opera, and of the gradual progress which it has made upon the English stage. For there is no question but our great grandchildren will be very curious to know the reason why their forefathers used to sit together like an audience of foreigners in their own country, and to hear whole plays acted before them in a tongue which they did not understand.

*Arsinoe*³ was the first opera that gave us a taste of Italian music. The great success this opera met with produced some attempts of forming pieces upon Italian plans, which should give a more natural and reasonable entertainment than what can be met with in the elaborate trifles of that nation. This alarmed the poetasters and fiddlers of the town, who were used to deal in a more ordinary kind of ware; and therefore laid down an established rule, which is received as such to this day, that nothing is capable of being well set to music, that is not nonsense.

This maxim was no sooner received, but we immediately fell to translating the Italian operas; and as there was no great danger of hurting the sense of those extraordinary pieces, our authors would often make words of their own which were entirely foreign to the meaning of the passages they pretended to translate; their chief care being to make the numbers⁴ of the English verse answer to those of the Italian, that both of

¹ naught I.e., wicked.

² Equitis ... vana Latin: "But now our nobles too are fops and vain, / Neglect the sense but love the Painted Scene." (Horace, Epistles 2.1. 87–88, translated by Creech.)

³ Arsinoe Thomas Clayton's opera Arsinoe, Queen of Cyprus (1705).

⁴ numbers Metrical feet.

them might go to the same tune. Thus the famous song in Camilla,¹

Barbara si t'intendo, &c.

Barbarous woman, yes, I know your meaning, which expresses the resentments of an angry lover, was translated into that English lamentation

Frail are a lover's hopes, &c.

And it was pleasant enough to see the most refined persons of the British nation dying away and languishing to notes that were filled with a spirit of rage and indignation. It happened also very frequently, where the sense was rightly translated, the necessary transposition of words which were drawn out of the phrase of one tongue into that of another made the music appear very absurd in one tongue, that was very natural in the other. I remember an Italian verse that ran thus word for word,

And turned my rage into pity;

which the English for rhyme's sake translated,

And into pity turned my rage.

By this means, the soft notes that were adapted to pity in the Italian fell upon the word rage in the English; and the angry sounds that were tuned to rage in the original, were made to express pity in the translation. It often-times happened, likewise, that the finest notes in the air fell upon the most insignificant words in the sentence. I have known the word and pursued through the whole gamut, have been entertained with many a melodious the, and have heard the most beautiful graces, quavers, and divisions bestowed upon then, for, and from; to the eternal honour of our English particles.²

The next step to our refinement was the introducing of Italian actors into our opera; who sung their parts in their own language, at the same time that our countrymen performed theirs in our native tongue. The king or hero of the play generally spoke in Italian, and his slaves answered him in English; the lover frequently made his court, and gained the heart of his princess, in a language which she did not understand. One would have thought it very difficult to have carried on dialogues after this manner, without an interpreter between the persons that conversed together; but this was the state of the English stage for about three years.

At length the audience grew tired of understanding half the opera, and therefore, to ease themselves entirely of the fatigue of thinking, have so order'd it at present that the whole opera is performed in an unknown tongue. We no longer understand the language of our own stage; insomuch that I have often been afraid, when I have seen our Italian performers chattering in the vehemence of action, that they have been calling us names, and abusing us among themselves; but I hope, since we do put such an entire confidence in them, they will not talk against us before our faces, though they may do it with the same safety as if it were behind our backs. In the meantime I cannot forbear thinking how naturally an historian who writes two or three hundred years hence, and does not know the taste of his wise forefathers, will make the following reflection, In the beginning of the eighteenth century the Italian tongue was so well understood in England that operas were acted on the public stage in that language.

Once scarce knows how to be serious in the confutation of an absurdity that shows itself at the first sight. It does not want any great measure of sense to see the ridicule of this monstrous practice; but what makes it the more astonishing, it is not the taste of the rabble, but of persons of the greatest politeness, which has established it. . . .

from The Licensing Act of 1737

... And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that from and after the said twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand, seven hundred and thirty seven, no person shall for hire, gain, or reward act, perform, represent, or cause to be acted, performed, or represented any new interlude, tragedy, comedy opera, play, farce, or other part added to any old interlude, tragedy,

¹ Camilla Italian opera first performed with an English libretto in 1706.

² particles Prepositions; insignificant parts of speech.

comedy, opera, play, farce, or other entertainment of the stage, or any new prologue or epilogue unless a true copy thereof be sent to the Lord Chamberlain of the King's household for the time being,¹ fourteen days at least before the acting, representing, or performing thereof, together with an account of the playhouse or other place where the same shall be and the time when the same is intended to be first acted, represented, or performed, signed by the master or manager, or one of the masters or managers of such playhouse or place, or company of actors therein.

4. And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid that from and after the said twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand, seven hundred and thirty seven, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Lord Chamberlain for the time being, from time to time, and when and as often as he shall think fit, to prohibit the acting, performing or representing any interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce or other entertainment of the stage, or any act, scene or part thereof, or any prologue or epilogue. And in case any person or persons shall for hire, gain or reward act, perform or represent, or cause to be acted, performed or represented, any interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce or other entertainment of the stage, or any act, scene, or part thereof, or any prologue or epilogue, contrary to such prohibition as aforesaid; every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of fifty pounds and every grant, licence, and authority (in any case there be any such) by or under which the said master or masters or manager or managers set up, formed, or continued such playhouse, or such company of actors, shall cease, determine and become absolutely void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

5. Provided always that no person or persons shall be authorised by virtue of any letters patent from His Majesty, his heirs, successors or predecessors, or by the licence of the Lord Chamberlain of His Majesty's household for the time being, to act, represent, or perform for hire, gain, or reward, any interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part or parts therein, in any part of Great Britain, except in the City of Westminster and within the liberties thereof, and in such places where His Majesty, his heirs or successors, shall in their royal persons reside, and during such residence only. . . .

from The Statute of Anne (1710)

An act for the encouragement of learning, by vesting the copies² of printed books in the authors or purchasers of such copies, during the times therein mentioned.

Whereas printers, booksellers, and other persons have of late frequently taken the liberty of printing, reprinting, and publishing, or causing to be printed, reprinted, and published, books and other writings, without the consent of the authors or proprietors of such books and writings, to their very great detriment, and too often to the ruin of them and their families: for preventing therefore such practices for the future, and for the encouragement of learned men to compose and write useful books, may it please Your Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the tenth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ten, the author of any book or books already printed, who hath not transferred to any other the copy or copies of such book or books, share or shares thereof, or the bookseller or booksellers, printer or printers, or other person or persons, who hath or have purchased or acquired the copy or copies of any book or books, in order to print or reprint the same, shall have the sole right and liberty of printing such book and books for the term of one and twenty years, to commence from the said tenth day of April, and no longer; and that the author of any book or books already composed and not printed and published, or that shall hereafter be composed, and his assignee, or assigns, shall have the sole liberty of printing and reprinting such book and books for the term of fourteen years, to commence from the day of the first publishing the same, and no longer; and that if any other bookseller, printer, or other person whatsoever, from and after the tenth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ten, within the times granted and limited by this act, as aforesaid, shall print, reprint, or import, or cause to be printed, reprinted, or imported any such book or books, without the consent of the proprietor or proprietors thereof first had and obtained in writing, signed in the presence of two or more credible witnesses; or knowing the same to be so printed or reprinted, without the consent of the proprietors, shall sell, publish, or expose to sale, or cause to be sold, published, or exposed to sale, any such book or books, without such consent first had and obtained, as aforesaid, then such offender or offenders shall forfeit such book or books, and all and every sheet or sheets, being part of such book or books, to the proprietor or proprietors of the copy thereof, who shall forthwith damask¹ and make waste-paper of them. And further, that every such offender or offenders shall forfeit one penny for every sheet which shall be found in his, her, or their custody, either printed or printing, published or exposed to sale, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, the one moiety thereof to the Queen's most excellent Majesty, Her heirs and successors, and the other moiety thereof to any person or persons that shall sue for the same, to be recovered in any of Her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, in which no wager of law, essoign,² privilege, or protection, or more than one imparlance,³ shall be allowed.

¹ for the time being Currently holding office.

² copies Copyright.

And whereas many persons may through ignorance offend against this act, unless some provision be made whereby the property in every such book, as is intended by this act to be secured to the proprietor or proprietors thereof, may be ascertained, as likewise the consent of such proprietor or proprietors for the printing or reprinting of such book or books may from time to time be known; be it therefore further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to subject any bookseller, printer, or other person whatsoever, to the forfeitures or penalties therein mentioned, for or by reason of the printing or reprinting of any book or books without such consent as aforesaid, unless the title to the copy of such book or books hereafter published shall, before such publication be entered in the register-book of the Company of Stationers, in such manner as hath been usual, which register-book shall at all times be kept at the hall of the said Company, and unless such consent of the proprietor or proprietors be in like manner entered, as aforesaid, for every of which several entries, six pence shall be paid, and no more; which said register-book may, at all reasonable and convenient times, be resorted to, and inspected by any bookseller, printer, or other person, for the purposes before mentioned, oned,⁴ without any fee or reward; and the clerk of the said Company of Stationers, shall, when and as often as thereunto required, give a certificate under his hand of such entry or entries, and for every such certificate, may take a fee not exceeding six pence. . . .

Provided always, and it is hereby enacted, that nine copies of each book or books, upon the best paper, that from and after the said tenth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ten, shall be printed and published, as aforesaid, or reprinted and published with additions, shall, by the printer and printers thereof, be delivered to the warehouse-keeper of the said Company of Stationers for the time being, at the Hall of the said Company, before such publication made, for the use of the Royal Library, the libraries of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the libraries of the four universities in Scotland, the library of Sion College in London, and the library commonly called the library belonging to the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh respectively.⁵ . . .

Provided nevertheless, that all actions, suits, bills, indictments, or informations for any offence that shall be committed against this act, shall be brought, sued, and commenced within three months next after such offence committed, or else the same shall be void and of none effect.

oned Joined; united.

⁴ nine copies ... respectively This confirmed and extended to Scotland a law of 1662 which gave the copyright libraries or libraries of record their status. The Bodleian Library at Oxford already had such an agreement, negotiated in 1610. The Royal Library later became the nucleus of the British Library.

damask Deface.

essoign Excuse for non-appearance in court at an appointed time.

³ imparlance Extension of time granted to allow the negotiation of an amicable settlement.

Provided always, that after the expiration of the said term of fourteen years, the sole right of printing or disposing of copies shall return to the authors thereof, if they are then living, for another term of fourteen years.

from James Boswell, The Life of Samuel Johnson (1791)

[20 July 1763]

Mr. Alexander Donaldson, bookseller of Edinburgh, had for some time opened a shop in London, and sold his cheap editions of the most popular English books, in defiance of the supposed common-law right of literary property. Johnson, though he concurred in the opinion which was afterwards sanctioned by a judgment of the House of Lords, that there was no such right,¹ was at this time very angry that the booksellers of London, for whom he uniformly professed much regard, should suffer from an invasion of what they had ever considered to be secure, and he was loud and violent against Mr. Donaldson. "He is a fellow who takes advantage of the law to injure his brethren; for, notwithstanding that the statute secures only fourteen years of exclusive right, it has always been understood by the trade that he who buys the copyright of a book from the author obtains a perpetual property;² and upon that belief, numberless bargains are made to transfer that property after the expiration of the statutory term. Now

¹ in defiance ... no such right In the 1769 case of Millar v. Taylor, the court ruled that a common-law right of literary property still existed, despite the Statute of Anne's changes in statutory law. In other words, when the statutory rights granted by the Statute of Anne expired, common-law rights would remain in effect, thus preventing works from ever entering the public domain. Donaldson v. Beckett, in 1774, overturned Millar v. Taylor by deciding that the Statute of Anne, which granted the author possession of copyright for the period of 14 years, had completely exploded the previous protection of literary property under common law. In other words, if the copyright of the author, or the publisher who had purchased the copyright, had expired, he or she could not sue another bookseller, such as Donaldson, for reprinting.

² he who buys ... property Reference to the custom of the time of perpetual copyright, according to which booksellers would buy and sell copyrights of books from earlier centuries—such as Shakespeare, Milton, John Dryden, and Aphra Behn—although they did not technically own these copyrights.

Donaldson, I say, takes advantage here, of people who have really an equitable title from usage; and if we consider how few of the books, of which they buy the property, succeed so well as to bring profit, we should be of opinion that the term of fourteen years is too short; it should be sixty years." DEMPSTER. "Donaldson, sir, is anxious for the encouragement of literature. He reduces the price of books, so that poor students may buy them." JOHNSON (laughing). "Well, sir, allowing that to be his motive, he is no better than Robin Hood, who robbed the rich in order to give to the poor."

It is remarkable that when the great question concerning literary property came to be ultimately tried before the supreme tribunal of this country, in consequence of the very spirited exertions of Mr. Donaldson, Dr. Johnson was zealous against a perpetuity; but he thought that the term of the exclusive right of authors should be considerably enlarged. He was then for granting a hundred years.³

Joseph Addison, The Tatler No. 224 (14 September 1710)

*Materiam superabat Opus.*⁴
— Ovid.

From my own apartment, September 13.

It is my custom, in a dearth of news, to entertain myself with those collections of advertisements that appear at the end of all our public prints.⁵ These I consider as accounts of news from the little world, in the same manner that the foregoing parts of the paper are from the great. If in one we hear that a sovereign prince is fled from his capital city, in the other we hear of a tradesman who hath shut up his shop and run away. If in one we find the victory of a general, in the other we see the desertion of a private soldier. I must confess, I have a certain weakness in my temper that is often very much affected by these little domestic occurrences, and have frequently been caught with tears in my eyes over a melancholy advertisement. But to consider this subject in its most ridiculous lights, advertisements are of great use to the vulgar; first of all, as they are instruments of ambition. A man that is by no means big enough for the *Gazette*¹ may easily creep into the advertisements; by which means we often see an apothecary in the same paper of news with a plenipotentiary,² or a running-footman with an ambassador. An advertisement from Piccadilly goes down to posterity with an article from Madrid; and John Bartlett of Goodman's Fields is celebrated in the same paper with the Emperor of Germany. Thus the fable tells us that the wren mounted as high as the eagle by getting upon his back.

³ He was ... years The present-day duration of copyright in Britain and the United States is the life of the author plus seventy years, and in Canada it is the life of the author plus fifty years.

⁴ Materiam superabat Opus Latin: "The craftsmanship will surpass the material." From Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.5.

⁵ those collections ... prints Here Addison is referring to personal advertisements, though he goes on to discuss commercial advertising in the following paragraphs.

A second use which this sort of writings have been turned to of late years has been the management of controversy, insomuch that above half the advertisements one meets with now-a-days are purely polemical. The inventors of strops³ for razors have written against one another this way for several years, and that with great bitterness; as the whole argument pro and con in the case of the morning-gowns is still carried on after the same manner. I need not mention the several proprietors of Dr. Anderson's Pills; nor take notice of the many satirical works of this nature so frequently published by Dr. Clark, who has had the confidence to advertise upon that learned knight, my very worthy friend, Sir William Read.⁴ But I shall not interpose in their quarrel; Sir William can give him his own in advertisements that, in the judgment of the impartial, are as well penned as the Doctor's.

The third and last use of these writings is to inform the world where they may be furnished with almost every thing that is necessary for life. If a man has pains in his head, colics⁵ in his bowels, or spots in his clothes, he may here meet with proper cures and remedies. If a man would recover a wife or a horse that is stolen or strayed; if he wants new sermons, electuaries,⁶ ass's milk, or anything else, either for his body or his mind, this is the place to look for them in.

The great art in writing advertisements is the finding out a proper method to catch the reader's eye; without which, a good thing may pass over unobserved, or be lost among commissions of bankruptcy. Asterisks and hands⁷ were formerly of great use for this purpose. Of late years, the *N.B.*⁸ has been much in fashion; as also little cuts and figures,⁹ the invention of which we must ascribe to the author of spring-trusses.¹⁰ I must not here omit the blind Italian¹¹ character, which being scarce legible, always fixes and detains the eye, and gives the curious reader something like the satisfaction of prying into a secret.

But the great skill in an advertiser is chiefly seen in the style which he makes use of. He is to mention the universal esteem, or general reputation, of things that were never heard of. If he is a physician or astrologer, he must change his lodgings frequently, and (though he never saw anybody in them besides his own family) give public notice of it, For the information of the nobility and gentry. Since I am thus usefully employed in writing criticisms on the works of these diminutive authors, I must not pass over in silence an advertisement which has lately made its appearance, and is written altogether in a Ciceronian¹² manner. It was sent to me, with five shillings, to be inserted among my advertisements; but as it is a pattern of good writing in this way, I shall give it a place in the body of my paper.

⁵ colics I.e., pains.

⁶ electuaries Medicinal pastes mixed with honey, preserve, or syrup.

⁷ hands I.e., figures of hands drawn with their forefingers pointing.

⁸ N.B. For nota bene (Latin: note well).

⁹ cuts and figures I.e., illustrations and diagrams.

¹⁰ spring-trusses Surgical appliances for applying pressure to a wound or hernia.

¹¹ Italian Italic.

¹² Ciceronian I.e., using inflated rhetoric. (Cicero was a celebrated Roman orator of the first century BCE.)

¹ Gazette England's official newspaper, a record of military and political events, whose advertisements largely consisted of bankruptcy notices. The paper was, at the time, edited by Addison's friend and partner Richard Steele.

² plenipotentiary Envoy given absolute authority to act as he or she sees fit in a particular matter.

³ strops Strips of leather for sharpening razors.

⁴ Sir William Read Ophthalmologist to Queen Anne, who was knighted in 1705 for curing soldiers and sailors of blindness.

The highest compounded spirit of lavender, the most glorious (if the expression may be used) enlivening scent and flavour that can possibly be, which so raptures the spirits, delights the gust,¹ and gives such airs to the countenance, as are not to be imagined but by those that have tried it. The meanest sort of the thing is admired by most gentlemen and ladies; but this far more, as by far it exceeds it, to the gaining among all a more than common esteem. It is sold (in neat flint bottles fit for the pocket) only at the Golden Key in Warton's Court near Holborn Bars, for 3s. 6d.² with directions.

At the same time that I recommend the several flowers in which this spirit of lavender is wrapped up (if the expression may be used), I cannot excuse my fellow labourers for admitting into their papers several uncleanly advertisements, not at all proper to appear in the works of polite writers. Among these I must reckon the Carminative Wind-expelling Pills. If the Doctor had called them only his Carminative Pills, he had been as cleanly as one could have wished; but the second word entirely destroys the decency of the first. There are other absurdities of this nature so very gross that I dare not mention them; and shall therefore dismiss this subject with a public admonition to Michael Parrot, that he do not presume any more to mention a certain worm he knows of, which, by the way, has grown seven foot in my memory; for, if I am not much mistaken, it is the same that was but nine foot long about six months ago.

By the remarks I have here made, it plainly appears that a collection of advertisements is a kind of miscellany,³ the writers of which, contrary to all authors, except men of quality,⁴ give money to the booksellers who publish their copies. The genius of the bookseller is chiefly shown in his method of ranging and digesting these little tracts. The last paper I took up in my hands places them in the following order:

The True Spanish Blacking for Shoes, &c.
The Beautifying Cream for the Face, &c.
Pease and Plasters, &c.
Nectar and Ambrosia, &c.
Four Freehold Tenements of 15. l.⁵ per Annum, &c.
The Present State of England, &c.⁶
Annotations upon the Tatler, &c.
A Commission of Bankrupt being awarded against B.L., Bookseller, &c.

from Samuel Johnson, The Idler No. 30 (11 November 1758)

... No species of literary men has lately been so much multiplied as the writers of news. Not many years ago the nation was content with one Gazette,⁷ but now we have not only in the metropolis papers for every morning and every evening, but almost every large town has its weekly historian, who regularly circulates his periodical intelligence,⁸ and fills the villages of his district with conjectures on the events of war, and with debates on the true interest of Europe.

To write news in its perfection requires such a combination of qualities that a man completely fitted for the task is not always to be found. In Sir Henry Wotton's⁹ jocular definition, "An ambassador" is said to be "a man of virtue sent abroad to tell lies for the advantage of his country"; a news-writer is "a man without virtue, who writes lies at home for his own profit." To these compositions is required neither genius nor knowledge, neither industry nor sprightliness; but contempt of shame and indifference to truth are absolutely necessary. He who, by a long familiarity with infamy, has obtained these qualities, may confidently tell today what he intends to contradict tomorrow; he may affirm fearlessly what he knows that he shall be obliged to recant, and may write letters from Amsterdam or Dresden to himself.

¹ gust Sense of taste.

² 3s. 6d. Three shillings and six pence.

³ miscellany I.e., anthology.

⁴ men of quality A dig at upper-class vanity authors.

⁵ l. Pounds.

The Present State of England, &c. An annual publication.

⁷ Gazette England's official newspaper.

⁸ intelligence Information.

⁹ Henry Wotton Diplomat and writer (1568–1639).

In a time of war the nation is always of one mind, eager to hear something good of themselves and ill of the enemy. At this time the task of news-writers is easy; they have nothing to do but to tell that a battle is expected, and afterwards that a battle has been fought, in which we and our friends, whether conquering or conquered, did all, and our enemies did nothing.

Scarce anything awakens attention like a tale of cruelty. The writer of news never fails in the intermission of action to tell how the enemies murdered children and ravished virgins; and, if the scene of action be somewhat distant, scalps half the inhabitants of a province.

Among the calamities of war may be justly numbered the diminution of the love of truth, by the falsehoods which interest dictates and credulity encourages. A peace will equally leave the warrior and relater of wars destitute of employment; and I know not whether more is to be dreaded from streets filled with soldiers accustomed to plunder, or from garrets filled with scribblers accustomed to lie.

from Clara Reeve, The Progress of Romance, through Times, Countries, Manners; with Remarks on the Good and Bad Effects of it, on them Respectively; in a Course of Evening Conversations (1785)

EVENING 7

EUPHRASIA. ... Among our early novel-writers we must reckon Mrs. Behn. There are strong marks of genius in all this lady's works, but unhappily, there are some parts of them very improper to be read by, or recommended to, virtuous minds, and especially to youth. She wrote in an age, and to a court of licentious manners, and perhaps we ought to ascribe to these causes the loose turn of her stories. Let us do justice to her merits, and cast the veil of compassion over her faults. She died in the year 1689, and lies buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. The inscription will show how high she stood in estimation at that time.

HORTENSIVS. Are you not partial to the sex of this genius, when you excuse in her what you would not to a man?

EUPHRASIA. Perhaps I may, and you must excuse me if I am so, especially as this lady had many fine and amiable qualities, besides her genius for writing.

SOPHRONIA. Pray let her rest in peace—you were speaking of the inscription on her monument, I do not remember it.

EUPHRASIA. It is as follows:

Mrs. APHRA BEHN, 1689.

Here lies a proof that wit can never be Defence enough against mortality.

Let me add that Mrs. Behn will not be forgotten so long as the tragedy of *Oroonoko*¹ is acted; it was from her story of that illustrious African that Mr. Southern wrote that play, and the most affecting parts of it are taken almost literally from her.

HORTENSIVS. Peace be to her manes!² I shall not disturb her, or her works.

EUPHRASIA. I shall not recommend them to your perusal, Hortensius.

The next female writer of this class is Mrs. Manley,³ whose works are still more exceptionable than Mrs. Behn's, and as much inferior to them in point of merit. She hoarded up all the public and private scandal within her reach, and poured it forth, in a work too well known in the last age, though almost forgotten in the present; a work that partakes of the style of the romance, and the novel. I forbear the name, and further observations on it, as Mrs. Manley's works are sinking gradually into oblivion. I am sorry to say they were once in fashion, which obliges me to mention them, otherwise I had rather be spared the pain of disgracing an author of my own sex.

SOPHRONIA. It must be confessed that these books of the last age were of worse tendency than any of those of the present.

¹ tragedy of Oroonoko Thomas Southerne's stage adaptation of Aphra Behn's Oroonoko, first performed in 1695, was tremendously popular in the eighteenth century.

² manes Spirit.

³ Manley Delarivier Manley, author of several romans à clef (which described and sometimes exaggerated the vices of actual people, mostly those in power, who appeared under fictitious names), including The New Atalantis (1709), for which she was arrested, and which is referred to here.

EUPHRASIA. My dear friend, there were bad books at all times, for those who sought for them. Let us pass them over in silence.

HORTENSIVS. No, not yet. Let me help your memory to one more lady-author of the same class—Mrs. Haywood. She has the same claim upon you as those you have last mentioned.

EUPHRASIA. I had intended to have mentioned Mrs. Haywood, though in a different way, but I find you will not suffer any part of her character to escape you.

HORTENSIVS. Why should she be spared any more than the others?

EUPHRASIA. Because she repented of her faults, and employed the latter part of her life in expiating the offences of the former. There is reason to believe that the examples of the two ladies we have spoken of seduced Mrs. Haywood into the same track; she certainly wrote some amorous novels in her youth,¹ and also two books of the same kind as Mrs. Manley's capital work, all of which I hope are forgotten.

HORTENSIVS. I fear they will not be so fortunate; they will be known to posterity by the infamous immortality conferred upon them by Pope in his Dunciad.²

EUPHRASIA. Mr. Pope was severe in his castigations, but let us be just to merit of every kind. Mrs. Haywood had the singular good fortune to recover a lost reputation, and the yet greater honour to atone for her errors. She devoted the remainder of her life and labours to the service of virtue. Mrs. Haywood was one of the most voluminous female writers that ever England produced, none of her latter works are destitute of merit, though they do not rise to the highest pitch of excellence. *Betsy Thoughtless*³ is reckoned her best novel; but those works by which she is most likely to be known to posterity, are the Female Spectator, and the Invisible Spy.⁴ This lady died so lately as the year 1758.

SOPHRONIA. I have heard it often said that Mr. Pope was too severe in his treatment of this lady; it was supposed that she had given some private offence, which he resented publicly as was too much his way.

HORTENSIVS. That is very likely, for he was not of a forgiving disposition. If I have been too severe also, you ladies must forgive me in behalf of your sex.

EUPHRASIA. Truth is sometimes severe. Mrs. Haywood's wit and ingenuity were never denied. I would be the last to vindicate her faults, but the first to celebrate her return to virtue, and her atonement for them.

SOPHRONIA. May her first writings be forgotten, and the last survive to do her honour!

from James Lackington, Memoirs of the Forty-Five First Years of the Life of James Lackington, Bookseller (1792)

I cannot help observing that the sale of books in general has increased prodigiously within the last twenty years. According to the best estimation I have been able to make, I suppose that more than four times the number of books are sold now than were sold twenty years since. The poorer sort of farmers, and even the poor country people in general, who before that period spent their winter evenings in relating stories of witches, ghosts, hobgoblins, &c, now shorten the winter nights by hearing their sons and daughters read tales, romances, &c; and on entering their houses, you may see Tom Jones, Roderick Random,⁵ and other entertaining books, stuck up on their bacon racks, &c. If John goes to town with a load of hay, he is charged to be sure not to forget to bring home "Peregrine Pickle's Advenwith what the market then, a generation after her earliest works, demanded.

¹ Female ... Spy Haywood's The Female Spectator, a highly successful periodical that she began in 1744, and The Invisible Spy (1755), a political tale.

⁵ Tom ... Random I.e., The History of Tom Jones (1749), by Henry Fielding, and The Adventures of Roderick Random (1748), by Tobias Smollett.

¹ amorous novels ... youth Of the list of Haywood's amorous "novels," the best known today may be Love in Excess (1719) and Fantomina (1725).

² Pope in his Dunciad Alexander's Pope's mock epic attack on Grub-Street writers, The Dunciad, features Eliza Haywood, with "two babes of love close clinging to her waist," as the prize in a pissing contest between rival booksellers Edmund Curll and William Chetwood.

³ Betsy Thoughtless Haywood's The History of Miss Betsy Thoughtless (1751) was probably her best known work. In this didactic work, the heroine learns to behave better before being rewarded by true love. The morality evident in the novel probably does not represent repentance on the part of the author, but a successful shift to keep tures";¹ and when Dolly is sent to market to sell her eggs, she is commissioned to purchase "The History of Pamela Andrews."² In short, all ranks and degrees now read. But the most rapid increase of the sale of books has been since the termination of the late war.³

A number of book-clubs are also formed in every part of England, where each member subscribes a certain sum quarterly to purchase books; in some of these clubs the books, after they have been read by all the subscribers, are sold among them to the highest bidders, and the money produced by such sale is expended in fresh purchases, by which prudent and judicious mode each member has it in his power to become possessed of the work of any particular author he may judge deserving a superior degree of attention; and the members at large enjoy the advantage of a continual succession of different publications, instead of being restricted to a repeated perusal of the same authors; which must have been the case with many, if so rational a plan had not been adopted.

I have been informed that when circulating libraries were first opened, the booksellers were much alarmed, and their rapid increase added to their fears, and led them to think that the sale of books would be much diminished by such libraries. But experience has proved that the sale of books, so far from being diminished by them, has been greatly promoted, as from those repositories many thousand families have been cheaply supplied with books, by which the taste for reading has become much more general, and thousands of books are purchased every year by such as have first borrowed them at those libraries, and after reading, approving of them, become purchasers.

Circulating libraries have also greatly contributed towards the amusement and cultivation of the other sex; by far the greatest part of ladies have now a taste for books.

Peregrine Pickle's Adventures Tobias Smollett's The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

The History ... Andrews Samuel Richardson's Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded (1740).

³ late war American Revolution.

"——Learning, once the man's exclusive pride, Seems verging fast towards the female side."⁴

It is true that I do not, with Miss Mary Wollstonecraft, "earnestly wish to see the distinction of sex confounded in society," not even with her exception, "unless where love animates the behaviour."⁵ And yet I differ widely from those gentlemen who would prevent the ladies from acquiring a taste for books; and as yet I have never seen any solid reason advanced why ladies should not polish their understandings, and render themselves fit companions for men of sense. And I have often thought that one great reason why some gentlemen spend all their leisure hours abroad,⁶ is, for want of rational companions at home; for, if a gentleman happens to marry a fine lady, as justly painted by Miss Wollstonecraft, or the square elbow family drudge, as drawn to the life by the same hand, I must confess that I see no great inducement that he has to desire the company of his wife, as she scarce can be called a rational companion, or one fit to be entrusted with the education of her children; and even Rousseau is obliged to acknowledge that it "is a melancholy thing for a father of a family, who is fond of home, to be obliged to be always wrapped up in himself, and to have nobody about him to whom he can impart his sentiments."⁷ Lord Lyttleton advises well in the two following lines:

"Do you, my fair, endeavour to possess
An elegance of mind, as well as dress."⁸

¹ Learning ... side From William Cowper's The Progress of Error (1782), lines 429–30.

⁵ earnestly wish ... behaviour From Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), Chapter 4.

⁶ abroad I.e., out of the house.

⁷ Rousseau ... sentiments Lackington is reflecting received wisdom when he supposes that the justification for educating women is not their own benefit but that of men. Here he quotes a passage from French philosopher Jean-Jacques Rousseau's Émile (1762) that Wollstonecraft also cites to support her argument that educated men would be happiest with compatible companions. Rousseau generally believed that women's education should be limited in order to maintain their innocence.

Do you ... dress From Advice to a Lady (1733), lines 27–28, by First Baron Lord Lyttleton, a patron of literature.

I cannot help thinking that the reason why some of the eastern nations treat the ladies with such contempt, and look upon them in such a degrading point of view, is owing to their marrying them when mere children, both as to age and understanding, which last being entirely neglected, they seldom are capable of rational conversation, and of course are neglected and despised. But this is not the case with English ladies;¹ they now in general read, not only novels, although many of that class are excellent productions, and tend to polish both the heart and head; but they also read the best books in the English language, and many read the best works in various languages; and there are some thousands of ladies who come to my shop that know as well what books to choose, and are as well acquainted with works of taste and genius as any gentlemen in the kingdom, notwithstanding the sneer against novel-readers, &c.

The Sunday-schools are spreading very fast in most parts of England, which will accelerate the diffusion of knowledge among the lower classes of the community and in a very few years exceedingly increase the sale of books. Here permit me earnestly to call on every honest bookseller (I trust my call will not be in vain) as well as on every friend to the extension of knowledge, to unite (as you I am confident will) in a hearty Amen.

from Thomas Erskine, Speech as Prosecution in the Seditious-Libel Trial of Thomas Williams for Publishing Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine (1797)

A free and unlicensed press, in the just and legal sense of the expression, has led to all the blessings both of religion and government, which Great Britain or any part of the world at this moment enjoys, and it is calculated to advance mankind to still higher degrees of civilization and happiness. But this freedom, like every other, must be limited to be enjoyed, and like every human advantage, may be defeated by its abuse. An intellectual book, however erroneous, addressed to the intellectual world upon so profound and complicated a subject, can never work the mischief which this Indictment is calculated to repress. Such works will only incite the minds of men enlightened by study, to a closer investigation of a subject well worthy of their deepest and continued contemplation. The powers of the mind are given for human improvement in the progress of human existence. The changes produced by such reciprocations of lights and intelligences are certain in their progressions, and make their way imperceptibly, by the final and irresistible power of truth. But this book has no such object, and no such capacity: it presents no arguments to the wise and enlightened. On the contrary, it treats the faith and opinions of the wisest with the most shocking contempt, and stirs up men, without the advantages of learning, or sober thinking, to a total disbelief of every thing hitherto held sacred; and consequently to a rejection of all the laws and ordinances of the state, which stand only upon the assumption of their truth.

But this ... ladies Here Lackington reflects another common line of thinking—that Asian and Middle-Eastern nations were inferior because of their supposedly inferior treatment of women.

EARLY EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY PERIODICALS

CONTEXTS

The English periodical was a new medium at the beginning of the eighteenth century, one that quickly began to play a prominent role in the formation of popular taste and political opinion—and in the shaping of English literature. Although the first English “news sheets” were printed in the seventeenth century, the eighteenth century saw the development and flourishing of two influential forms—the periodical essay and the magazine.

The variety of readers that periodicals attracted was unprecedented. Although their primary audience was urban and middle class, periodicals also found readers in the aristocracy and the laboring class, and they had a significant audience outside London. Even those who were illiterate could have access to periodicals, which were often read aloud to groups of people. Men gathered in coffeehouses, chocolate houses, and clubs to read and discuss the latest issues of the leading periodicals; both men and women discussed them at home. Even periodicals such as The Female Spectator and The Female Tatler, which were presented as specifically tailored to women, in fact had a mixed gender audience. But if reading periodicals was an activity available to both genders, writing them was far less so; between 1700 and 1770, when periodical titles abounded, only five women are known to have authored their own. (Writings by one of these—Eliza Haywood—is included below.)

The periodicals themselves varied enormously in content, offering political opinion, social commentary, critical reviews, fiction, poetry, advertising, and more. Some individual publications were specialized, but others were wildly eclectic in their selection of content. Periodicals were differentiated from other media by their patterns of creation and consumption; they were written quickly and issued often. Each periodical was planned for release on a regular basis—daily, weekly, or monthly. Some were printed on one large sheet, others on several sheets of paper. They tended to be disposable, and were often reused as scrap paper—although the best ones were sometimes shared and reread until the paper fell apart. Successful periodicals were often granted an afterlife as bound books; many collectors had their individual issues bound together, and printers continued to re-issue and sell old titles in the form of annuals or complete collections. Sometimes these compilations were more widely read than the initial run had been; in collected form, some successful periodicals were still being reprinted and sold in the nineteenth century.

The nature of the periodical tended in several ways to broaden the exchange of ideas. Writers were encouraged to exchange ideas with their audiences, and to engage with other periodicals and other forms of literature. Many periodicals published readers’ letters—both real and fictional ones—and often responses to the letters as well. Periodicals advertised and reviewed books and theatrical performances, thereby helping to shape the new genre of literary criticism.

Periodical writers drew inspiration from, commented upon, and even unapologetically stole from each other. They also exchanged arguments. Every political periodical—and even most that were not explicitly political—had an agenda and a party affiliation, and both authors and readers believed in the power of public opinion to affect government behavior. Political writers could be vicious, often adopting a wittily abusive style in their efforts to entertain readers and sell more papers—but they also tended to be cautious, veiling attacks in a variety of ways in the hope of avoiding arrest for “seditious libel.”¹ Other essayists focused less on politics than on social commentary, styling themselves as defenders of public morality or of good taste—though these sorts of argument could also carry implicit political messages. Some periodical writers engaged in non-political insult contests, abusing personal enemies and lampooning writers whose work they held in contempt.

There were many who held low opinions of certain periodicals, and many who viewed the genre as a whole with distaste. Members of the privileged classes frequently expressed disdain for periodical readers and writers, who were often (though by no means exclusively) middle class; periodicals were relatively inexpensive reading material, and during the eighteenth century they became one of the best ways for a working writer to earn a living. Periodicals were closely associated with the image of the “Grub Street hack,” living in one of the shabby garrets above the publishing houses of Grub Street and prostituting his meager skills, churning out writing without regard to political truth or artistic merit.

Periodical writing was indeed driven by deadlines and market demands, and the quality was extremely varied. Nonetheless, many of the era’s major literary figures were accomplished periodical writers: Daniel Defoe, Jonathan Swift, Eliza Haywood, Samuel Johnson, Samuel Richardson, Oliver Goldsmith, and Mary Wortley Montagu, among many others, all worked in the medium.

Of all the writers who contributed to the genre, the first names associated with the eighteenth-century periodical are those of Richard Steele and Joseph Addison, who early in the century authored two extraordinarily influential publications: The Tatler (1709–11) and The Spectator (1711–12). Although the two friends worked on both periodicals, The Tatler was primarily Steele’s work, while The Spectator is more closely associated with Addison; both were instrumental in developing a conventional style and format used by many periodical authors of the century. One of Richard Steele’s major innovations was to adopt a persona; he wrote many pieces as Isaac Bickerstaff, Esquire, whose character he developed as that of an observant and likeable old man. Political writers had long been making use of pseudonyms—Steele’s originality lay in going beyond the mere use of a different name; by developing Bickerstaff’s personality, he made his social commentary more appealing to readers. The highlight of each issue of The Tatler was a personal musing ostensibly written by Bickerstaff. These pieces originated as a short feature but were so popular that they came to occupy most of the paper, evolving into a new form; Bickerstaff’s “lucubrations” were unified essays, written in a persona, and intended both to entertain and to morally improve their audience.

When The Tatler concluded, Addison and Steele fully embraced this new form in their new project, The Spectator. Each issue of The Spectator features a single essay (usually criticism or social commentary) written in the persona of the witty, eccentric Mr. Spectator, a quiet man who wanders London’s public places, himself unnoticed, observing all that happens in the city. The Spectator was even more successful than its predecessor; Addison estimated that 60,000 people—one tenth of London’s population—read each daily issue. Because The Tatler and The Spectator were so popular, and continued to sell in compilation throughout the century (The Tatler sold more than 25 editions before 1800), they inspired many imitations by authors hoping for similar commercial success.

The printer Edward Cave played an equally important role in the development of periodicals as the founder of the first successful “magazine.” The Gentleman’s Magazine, which Cave first issued in 1731, made a monthly selection from other periodical publications from essays in verse to weather information, from serialized short stories to obituaries, into a single monthly volume with something of interest for any general reader. Cave used the word “magazine”—the original meaning of which was “storehouse”—to describe this miscellany. His venture was a popular success, and many printers imitated his new format; they borrowed from its title as well, and many other “magazines” were born.

¹ sedition libel E.g., Henry Haines, printer of the opposition journal, The Craftsman, was arrested in 1737 for material written about George II. He was tried and sentenced in 1738 and fined two thousand pounds.

Content in these periodicals was indeed varied. Items published in the popular British Magazine during the first few months of 1760, for example, included “A letter concerning a new Method for sweetening Seawater,” “A Translation of a Speech made by the Dutch ambassador to the King,” “An accurate Map of Louisiana and the Territory in Dispute Between the English and the French,” “Description of the Rattlesnake Plant in Louisiana,” the sheet music for “Retirement: A New Song,” and a set of “New Mathematical Questions”—all this in addition to political essays, fiction, and a good deal else.

from Joseph Addison,¹ The Tatler No. 155 [The Political Upholsterer] (6 April 1710)

Like other miscellaneous articles in The Tatler, this essay is addressed from the apartment of Isaac Bickerstaff. Through the persona of the elderly Bickerstaff, writers for The Tatler often adopt a light, mocking attitude toward human failings; John Gay once commented that “Bickerstaff ventured to tell the town that they were a parcel of fops, fools, and vain coquettes, but in such a manner as even pleased them.” The following essay discusses a Londoner’s obsession with following the news.

—Aliena negotia curat
*Excussus propriis.*²—

HORACE

From My Own Apartment, April 5.

There lived some years since within my neighbourhood a very grave person, an upholsterer, who seemed a man of more than ordinary application to business. He was a very early riser, and was often abroad two or three hours before any of his neighbours. He had a particular carefulness in the knitting of his brows, and a kind of impatience in all his motions that plainly discovered he was always intent on matters of importance. Upon my enquiry into his life and conversation, I found him to be the greatest newsmonger³ in our quarter; that he rose before day to read the Post-Man;⁴ and that he would take two or three turns to the other end of the town before his neighbours were up, to see if there were any Dutch mails⁵ come in. He had a wife and several children, but was much more inquisitive to know what passed in Poland than in his own family, and was in greater pain and anxiety of mind for King Augustus’s⁶ welfare than that of his nearest relations. He looked extremely thin in a dearth of news, and never enjoyed himself in a westerly wind.⁷ This indefatigable kind of life was the ruin of his shop; for about the time that his favourite prince⁸ left the crown of Poland, he broke and disappeared.

This man and his affairs had been long out of my mind, till about three days ago, as I was walking in St. James’s Park,⁹ I heard somebody at a distance hemming after me: and who should it be but my old neighbour

³ newsmonger Here, political gossip.

⁴ Post-Man Popular Whig newspaper, issued in the morning.

⁵ Dutch mails I.e., foreign news; nearby nations sent weekly ships to London bearing mail, including international news correspondence.

⁶ King Augustus King Frederick Augustus I of Poland (1670–1733), who participated in the Great Northern War (1700–21) against King Charles XII of Sweden. Charles defeated and deposed Frederick, but Frederick regained his crown in 1709 when the tide turned against Sweden. Sweden eventually lost the war to Russia and its allies.

⁷ westerly wind Such a wind would delay the arrival of the foreign news.

⁸ his favourite prince I.e., Frederick Augustus I.

⁹ St. James’s Park Fashionable park in London.

¹ Joseph Addison Richard Steele founded The Tatler and wrote most of the issues himself, but he also printed work by other writers. Steele’s close friend Joseph Addison was the most frequent contributor.

² Aliena negotia ... propriis Latin: “He looks after other people’s business, having lost his own” (altered from Horace, Satires 2.3.19–20).

the upholsterer? I saw he was reduced to extreme poverty, by certain shabby superfluities in his dress: for notwithstanding that it was a very sultry day for the time of the year, he wore a loose greatcoat and a muff, with a long campaign wig out of curl; to which he had added the ornament of a pair of black garters buckled under the knee.¹ Upon his coming up to me, I was going to enquire into his present circumstances, but was prevented by his asking me with a whisper whether the last letters brought any accounts that one might rely upon from Bender?² I told him none that I heard of, and asked him whether he had yet married his eldest daughter? He told me no. "But pray," says he, "tell me sincerely, what are your thoughts of the King of Sweden?" For though his wife and children were starving, I found his chief concern at present was for this great monarch. I told him that I looked upon him as one of the first heroes of the age. "But pray," says he, "do you think there is anything in the story of his wound?" And finding me surprised at the question, "Nay," says he, "I only propose it to you." I answered that I thought there was no reason to doubt of it. "But why in the heel," says he, "more than in any other part of the body?" "Because," says I, "the bullet chanced to light there."

This extraordinary dialogue was no sooner ended but he began to launch out into a long dissertation upon the affairs of the North; and after having spent some time on them, he told me he was in a great perplexity how to reconcile the Supplement with the English Post, and had been just now examining what the other papers say upon the same subject. "The Daily Courant," says he, "has these words: We have advices from very good hands that a certain Prince has some matters of great importance under consideration. This is very mysterious, but the Post-Boy leaves us more in the dark; for he tells us That there are private intimations of measures taken by a certain Prince, which time will bring to light. Now the Post-Man," says he, "who uses³ to be very clear, refers to the same news in these words, The late conduct of a certain Prince affords great matter of speculation. This certain Prince," says the upholsterer, "whom they are all so cautious of naming, I take to be——" Upon which, though there was nobody near us, he whispered something in my ear, which I did not hear, or think worth my while to make him repeat.

We were now to the upper end of the Mall,⁴ where were 3 or 4 very odd fellows sitting together upon the bench. . . .

I at length took my leave of the company, and was going away; but had not been gone 30 yards before the upholsterer hemmed again after me. Upon his advancing towards me with a whisper, I expected to hear some secret piece of news which he had not thought fit to communicate to the bench; but instead of that, he desired me⁵ in my ear to lend him half a crown.⁶ In compassion to so needy a statesman, and to dissipate the confusion I found he was in, I told him, if he pleased, I would give him five shillings, to receive five pounds of him when the Great Turk was driven out of Constantinople;⁷ which he very readily accepted, but not before he had laid down to me the impossibility of such an event as the affairs of Europe now stand.

This paper I design for the particular benefit of those worthy citizens who live more in a coffeehouse than in their shops, and whose thoughts are so taken up with the affairs of the Allies that they forget their customers.

from The Female Tatler No. 1 [Introduction, Advertisement] (8 July 1709)

Inspired by The Tatler, many periodicals attempted to share in its popularity; The Female Tatler (1709–10) was one that succeeded. Through the persona of "Mrs. Crackenthorpe, a lady that knows every thing," The Female Tatler entertained its audience—both men and women readers—with scandal and social commentary.

¹ campaign wig Wig with full, decorative curls; black garters . . . the knee These were extremely unfashionable at the time.

² Bender Town in the Ottoman Empire to which Charles XII of Sweden fled in 1709 after a major defeat in the Great Northern War. He remained there for five years.

³ uses I.e., tends.

⁴ Mall Pall Mall, a promenade in St. James's Park.

⁵ desired me Requested of me.

⁶ half a crown Two and a half shillings.

⁷ Constantinople Capital of the Ottoman Empire, a participant in the Great Northern War.

As its eighteenth-century readers did, present-day scholars are still speculating about the authorship of The Female Tatler; the writer most frequently suggested as the creator of Mrs. Crackenthorpe is pamphleteer and novelist Delarivier Manley. A male author is also a possibility; it was not unusual for men to adopt female personae in writing periodicals that were, like this one, more social than political in content.

The early success of The Female Tatler was clearly marked by the springing up of a rival after eighteen numbers. The original publisher, Benjamin Bragge, faced an alternative Female Tatler issued by Abigail Baldwin. Each claimed to be the original confronting an imposter: the Baldwin colophon claims that Crackenthorpe found herself in dispute with her original publisher.

[INTRODUCTION]

I hope Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq.,¹ will not think I invade his property by undertaking a paper of this kind, since tatling was ever adjudged peculiar to our sex; my design is not to rival his performance, or in the least prejudice the reputation he has deservedly gained. But as more ridiculous things are done every day than ten such papers can relate, I desire leave to prate a little to the town, and try what diversion my intelligence can give 'em. My acquaintance, which is a very great part of the town (for I am intimate with everybody at first sight) have encouraged me to this attempt by saying I have the character of knowing everybody's actions, and have sometimes pretended to declare people's intentions, 'tis true, I have twice a week a very great assembly of both sexes, from his Grace my Lord Duke to Mr. Sagathy the spruce mercer² in the city; and from her Grace my Lady Duchess to Mrs. Topsail, the sea captain's wife at Wapping;³ not that my drawing room ever had the least ill character, though a foolish baronet once called it the Scandal Office. But as I am courteous to all persons, and strangers have the same respect paid 'em as my former acquaintance, half the nation visits me, where I have a true history of the world; and to oblige those who are absent from me, by turns, shall endeavour to give it 'em again. I shall date all my advices from my own apartment, which comprehends White's, Will's, the Grecian, Garraway's in Exchange Alley, and all the India houses within the bills of mortality.⁴ Since grave statesmen, airy beaus, lawyers, cits,⁵ poets, and parsons, and ladies of all degrees assemble there, each person delivers himself according to his talent, which gives me a superficial smattering for all of 'em. The variety of our conversation affords general satisfaction; books are canvassed, removals at court suggested, law cases disputed, the price of stocks told, the beaus and ladies inform us of new fashions, and the first long pocket that was seen in town received its reputation from being approved of at Mrs. Crackenthorpe's drawing room. But when we get into general tittle-tattle, 'tis every little story that happens to get air; those of quality are as liable to reflection as their inferiors, and seldom any person obliges the company with a new piece of scandal, but 'tis repaid him with above twenty more. And though to support my visiting days, I am forced to act the good Lady Praise-all myself, yet the moment any visitor retires to give place to a fresh comer in, someone of the company breaks out into (if a gentleman), "Really, Mrs. Crackenthorpe, Sir Charles is mighty good company, would he not rail at people so behind their backs. Pray what estate has he?" Says another, "I hear but small, and they say damnably dipped."⁶ (If a lady) "Cousin Crackenthorpe, d'you think that lady handsome, she's horrid silly however, and not a bit genteel; but what a load of jewels she had on." "Ay," says another, "they say she lies in 'em;"⁷ I don't believe her earrings were right." As

¹ Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq. Persona adopted by Richard Steele as author of The Tatler.

² Sagathy Fine fabric similar to serge; mercier Seller of fine fabrics.

³ Wapping Riverside community of sailors and shipbuilders near London.

⁴ I shall ... of mortality Refers to the organization of The Tatler, in which most articles supposedly come from London's popular coffeehouses, with the rest addressed from Bickerstaff's "own apartment"; White's, Will's ... Exchange Alley London coffee or chocolate houses; India houses Shops selling goods imported from India or the East Indies; within the ... of mortality I.e., within the district of London (the area for which the city keeps a record of births and deaths).

beaus Fashionable men; cits Urban businesspeople.

⁶ damnably dipped Heavily mortgaged.

⁷ she lies in 'em I.e., they are fake.

to particular stories, I shall begin my second paper with them; but in that, and every following piece, as I find encouragement to proceed, shall be very careful, unjustly or ungenteely, not to reflect upon any person whatsoever, but gently to correct the vices and vanities which some of distinction, as well as others, willfully commit. . . .

I would entreat those who are not particularly acquainted with me, that they would not imagine I write this paper merely for the profit that may accrue to me by it; for all that I have the honour to be intimate with, know that I have an estate of 300 *l. per an.*¹ and always kept two maids and a footman; but if I should happen to succeed beyond my expectation, it might so far advance my fortune that I may be able to keep a coach as well as my sister Micklethwait. I shall follow Mr. Bickerstaff's method to get a footing into the world, and deliver the first paper gratis.² Afterwards those that will receive them at the price of 1 *d.*³ will in some measure repay the charge and trouble of such an undertaking; and to prevent mistakes, which may happen by people's enquiring for either of the Tatlers, I shall publish mine the contrary days, viz. Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays.⁴

PHOEBE CRACKENTHORPE.

[ADVERTISEMENT]

A gentleman who can give a very good account of his family would accept a place of about 500 l. per an. provided it requires little or no attendance, he never having had any great genius to business; he is willing to reside as a companion to some nobleman at his seat in the country, during the summer season, provided he has a chariot to attend him everywhere, and a handsome allowance for clothes and pocket money; or would accompany him to Tunbridge, or the Bath,⁵ having his charges born.⁶ He is not much

¹ l. per an. Pounds per year.

² gratis Free.

³ 1 d. One penny.

⁴ to prevent . . . and Fridays The original Tatler was issued on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays; viz. Abbreviation of the Latin videlicet, meaning "namely" or "that is to say."

Tunbridge, or the Bath Popular English spa resorts.

⁶ his charges born I.e., the cost paid by his employer.

inclined to go abroad, but if the government would send him in a distinguishing post to any pleasant part of Europe, he might be induced to accept of the same, out of a general disposition he has to serve his country.

Richard Steele, The Spectator No. 11 [Inkle and Yarico] (13 March 1711)

The story of Inkle and Yarico first appeared as an anecdote in A True & Exact History of the Island of Barbados (1657), the Englishman Richard Ligon's autobiographical account of Barbadian life. Toward the end of the century—decades after it was first retold in the Spectator essay below—Inkle and Yarico were revived again as a popular subject for abolitionist poets and playwrights. One version, a musical comedy by George Colman, was among the most popular plays of the late eighteenth century; in this and many later versions, the story is altered so that Yarico is African, and in the end Inkle chooses not to sell her, the lovers reconciling instead.

*Dat veniam corvis, vexat censura columbas.*⁷

JUVENAL

Arietta is visited by all persons of both sexes who have Any pretence to wit and gallantry. She is in that time of life which is neither affected with the follies of youth or infirmities of age; and her conversation is so mixed with gaiety and prudence that she is agreeable both to the young and the old. Her behaviour is very frank, without being in the least blameable; and as she is out of the tract of any amorous or ambitious pursuits of her own, her visitants entertain her with accounts of themselves very freely, whether they concern their passions or their interests. I made her a visit this afternoon, having been formerly introduced to the honour of her acquaintance by my friend Will Honeycomb,⁸

⁷ Dat veniam . . . columbas Latin: "[The censor] absolves the raven and harasses the doves" (Juvenal, Satires 2.63).

Will Honeycomb Mr. Spectator is helped in his observations by members of his club, who are delineated as fictional characters. Will Honeycomb is one of them and so is Roger de Coverley, the crusty Tory squire or rural landowner, whose character enables Addison to voice a political mindset which was very far from his own.

who has prevailed upon her to admit me sometimes into her assembly, as a civil, inoffensive man. I found her accompanied with one person only, a commonplace talker, who, upon my entrance, rose, and after a very slight civility sat down again, then, turning to Arietta, pursued his discourse, which I found was upon the old topic of constancy in love. He went on with great facility in repeating what he talks every day of his life; and, with the ornaments of insignificant laughs and gestures, enforced his arguments by quotations out of plays and songs which allude to the perjuries of the fair and the general levity¹ of women. Methought he strove to shine more than ordinarily in his talkative way, that he might insult my silence and distinguish himself before a woman of Arietta's taste and understanding. She had often an inclination to interrupt him, but could find no opportunity 'till the larum² ceased of itself; which it did not 'till he had repeated and murdered the celebrated story of the Ephesian matron.³

Arietta seemed to regard this piece of raillery⁴ as an outrage done to her sex; as indeed I have always observed that women, whether out of a nicer regard to their honour, or what other reason I cannot tell, are more sensibly touched with those general aspersions which are cast upon their sex than men are by what is said of theirs.

When she had a little recovered herself from the serious anger she was in, she replied in the following manner.

Sir, when I consider how perfectly new all you have said on this subject is, and that the story you have given us is not quite two thousand years old, I cannot but think it a piece of presumption to dispute with you: but your quotations put me in mind of the fable of the lion and the man. The man, walking with that noble animal, showed him in the ostentation of human superiority a sign of a man killing a lion. Upon which the lion said very justly, "We lions are none of us painters, else we could show a hundred men killed by lions, for one lion killed by a man." You men are writers, and can represent us women as unbecoming as you please in your works, while we are unable to return the injury. You have twice or thrice observed in your discourse that hypocrisy is the very foundation of our education, and that an ability to dissemble our affections is a professed part of our breeding. These and such other reflections are sprinkled up and down the writings of all ages, by authors who leave behind them memorials of their resentment against the scorn of particular women, in invectives against the whole sex. Such a writer, I doubt not, was the celebrated Petronius, who invented the pleasant aggravations of the frailty of the Ephesian lady; but when we consider this question between the sexes, which has been either a point of dispute or raillery ever since there were men and women, let us take facts from plain people, and from such as have not either ambition or capacity to embellish their narrations with any beauties of imagination. I was the other day amusing myself with Ligon's Account of Barbados; and, in answer to your well-wrought tale, I will give you (as it dwells upon my memory) out of that honest traveller, in his fifty-fifth page, the history of Inkle and Yarico.

Mr. Thomas Inkle of London, aged twenty years, embarked in the Downs⁵ on the good ship called the Achilles, bound for the West Indies, on the 16th of June, 1647, in order to improve his fortune by trade and merchandise.⁶ Our adventurer was the third son of an eminent citizen, who had taken particular care to instil into his mind an early love of gain, by making him a perfect master of numbers, and consequently giving him a quick view of loss and advantage, and preventing the natural impulses of his passions by prepossession towards his interests. With a mind thus turned, young Inkle had a person every way agreeable, a ruddy vigour in his countenance, strength in his limbs, with ringlets of fair hair loosely flowing on his shoulders. It happened in the course of the voyage that the Achilles, in some

¹ perjuries of the fair Deceitful behavior of women; levity I.e., lack of seriousness.

² larum Noise.

³ story of the Ephesian matron From Petronius's Satyricon (first century CE). A widow, grieving the death of her husband, decides to starve herself to death in his tomb. She is discovered by a soldier, who convinces her to eat and then seduces her. Infatuated with his new lover, the soldier neglects his duties; he has been stationed to guard the crucified corpses of criminals, and one of the corpses is stolen. The widow offers her husband's body to replace the criminal's so the soldier will not be punished for abandoning his post.

⁴ raillery Banter.

⁵ the Downs Site of a major English port.

⁶ merchandise Commerce.

distress, put into a creek on the main of America, in search of provisions; the youth, who is the hero of my story, among others, went ashore on this occasion. From their first landing they were observed by a party of Indians, who hid themselves in the woods for that purpose. The English unadvisedly marched a great distance from the shore into the country, and were intercepted by the natives, who slew the greatest number of them. Our adventurer escaped, among others, by flying into a forest. Upon his coming into a remote and pathless part of the wood, he threw himself, breathless, on a little hillock, when an Indian maid rushed from a thicket behind him. After the first surprise, they appeared mutually agreeable to each other. If the European was highly charmed with the limbs, features, and wild graces of the naked American, the American was no less taken with the dress, complexion, and shape of an European, covered from head to foot. The Indian grew immediately enamoured of him, and consequently solicitous¹ for his preservation; she therefore conveyed him to a cave, where she gave him a delicious repast of fruits and led him to a stream to slake his thirst. In the midst of these good offices, she would sometimes play with his hair, and delight in the opposition of its colour to that of her fingers; then open his bosom, then laugh at him for covering it. She was, it seems, a person of distinction, for she every day came to him in a different dress, of the most beautiful shells, bugles,² and braids. She likewise brought him a great many spoils, which her other lovers had presented to her, so that his cave was richly adorned with all the spotted skins of beasts and most particoloured³ feathers of fowls which that world afforded. To make his confinement more tolerable, she would carry him in the dusk of the evening, or by the favour of moon-light, to unfrequented groves and solitudes,⁴ and show him where to lie down in safety and sleep amidst the falls of waters and melody of nightingales. Her part was to watch and hold him in her arms, for fear of her countrymen, and wake on occasions to consult his safety. In this manner did the lovers pass away their time, till they had learned a language of their own, in which the voyager communicated to his mistress how happy he should be to have her in his country, where she should be clothed in such silks as his waistcoat was made of, and be carried in houses drawn by horses, without being exposed to wind or weather. All this he promised her the enjoyment of, without such fears and alarms as they were there tormented with. In this tender correspondence these lovers lived for several months, when Yarico, instructed by her lover, discovered a vessel on the coast, to which she made signals; and in the night, with the utmost joy and satisfaction, accompanied him to a ship's crew of his countrymen, bound for Barbados. When a vessel from the main⁵ arrives in that island, it seems the planters come down to the shore, where there is an immediate market of the Indians and other slaves, as with us of horses and oxen.

To be short, Mr. Thomas Inkle, now coming into English territories, began seriously to reflect upon his loss of time, and to weigh with himself how many days' interest of his money he had lost during his stay with Yarico. This thought made the young man very pensive, and careful what account he should be able to give his friends of his voyage. Upon which considerations, the prudent and frugal young man sold Yarico to a Barbadian merchant; notwithstanding that the poor girl, to incline him to commiserate her condition, told him that she was with child by him. But he only made use of that information to rise in his demands upon the purchaser.

I was so touched with this story (which I think should be always a counterpart to the Ephesian matron) that I left the room with tears in my eyes; which a woman of Arietta's good sense did, I am sure, take for greater applause than any compliments I could make her.

¹ solicitous Anxious.

² bugles Long, round beads.

³ particoloured Multicolored.

⁴ solitudes Unoccupied places.

⁵ main Ocean.

Joseph Addison, The Spectator No. 112 [Sir Roger at Church] (9 July 1711)

The essays in The Spectator are populated by Mr. Spectator's fictional friends, including a scholar, a city merchant, a military captain, a womanizer, and a clergyman. Number 112 features The Spectator's best known character, Sir Roger de Coverley, an eccentric Tory gentleman who is the squire of a country estate.

A facsimile of the issue is included on the next two pages. The Spectator was printed in the format typical for periodicals in the early part of the century: two columns on both sides of a single sheet, with advertising at the end. All issues of The Spectator begin with a quotation; number 112 begins with a line attributed to the Greek philosopher Pythagoras. It means "first worship the immortal gods as the law ordains."

from Joseph Addison, The Spectator No. 127 [On the Hoop Petticoat] (26 July 1711)

The beginning of the eighteenth century saw the invention of the hoop petticoat, an undergarment containing a framework of whalebone, cane, or wire that was worn to enlarge a woman's skirts. Although they were expensive, cumbersome, and mercilessly mocked by contemporary satirists—as in the Spectator essay below—they remained fashionable into the 1780s.

*Quantum est in rebus inane?*¹

PERS.

It is our custom at Sir Roger's,² upon the coming in of the post, to sit about a pot of coffee and hear the old knight read Dyer's Letter,³ which he does with his spectacles upon his nose, and in an audible voice, smiling very often at those little strokes of satire which are so frequent in the writings of that author. I afterwards communicate to the knight such packets as I receive under the quality of SPECTATOR.⁴ The following letter chancing to please him more than ordinary, I shall publish it at his request.

¹ Quantum ... inane Latin: "How much emptiness is in the world" (Persius, Satires 1.1).

² Sir Roger Mr. Spectator's fictional friend Sir Roger de Coverley, a lovable country squire.

³ Dyer's Letter A long-running newsletter commonly read by Tory country gentlemen (such as Sir Roger), Dyer's Weekly Letter was known for fabricating stories and was often mocked by Addison and other Whigs.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

You have diverted the town almost a whole month at the expense of the country;⁵ it is now high time that you should give the country their revenge. Since your withdrawing from this place, the fair sex are run into great extravagancies. Their petticoats, which began to heave and swell before you left us, are now blown up into a most enormous concave, and rise every day more and more: in a word, sir, since our women know themselves to be out of the eye of the SPECTATOR, they will be kept within no compass. You praised them a little too soon for the modesty of their head-dresses;⁶ for as the humour⁷ of a sick person is often driven out of one limb into another, their superfluity of ornaments, instead of being entirely banished, seems only fallen from their heads upon their lower parts. What they have lost in height they make up in breadth and, contrary to all rules of architecture, widen the foundations at the same time that they shorten the superstructure. Were they, like Spanish jennets,⁸ to impregnate by the wind, they could not have thought on a more proper invention. But as we do not yet hear any particular use in this petticoat, or ⁴ such packets ... of SPECTATOR I.e., letters to the editor of The Spectator. Addison and Steele published both real and fictional letters; the following letter is Addison's work.

⁵ You have ... the country In issue number 106, Mr. Spectator accepts an invitation to spend a month in the country, and he remains there until number 133. Many of the essays during this period focus on life in the country.

⁶ You praised ... head-dresses In number 98, Mr. Spectator declares himself pleased that the fashion for extravagant, tall hairstyles has passed.

⁷ humour In early eighteenth-century medicine, one of four governing substances that control the body. Disease was still thought to result from an imbalance in the humors.

⁸ jennets Spanish horses. In his Natural History, the ancient Roman author Pliny describes Spanish horses conceiving offspring by facing the west wind (8.67).

The SPECTATOR.

Ἀθανάτους μὲν πρῶτα θεός, νόμος αὖς δίδικται;
 Τιμᾷ ——— Pyth.

Monday, July 9. 1711.

I Am always very well pleased with a Country Sunday; and think, if keeping holy the Seventh Day had been only a human Institution, it would have been the best Method that could have been thought of for the polishing and civilizing of Mankind. It is certain the Country-People would soon degenerate into a kind of Savages and Barbarians, were there not such frequent Returns of a stated Time, in which the whole Village meet together with their best Faces, and in their cleanliest Drefs, to converse with one another upon indifferent Subjects, hear their Duties explained to them, and join together in Adoration of the supreme Being. Sunday clears away the Rust of the whole Week, not only as it refreshes in their Minds the Notions of Religion, but as it puts both the Sexes upon appearing in their most agreeable Forms, and exerting all such Qualities as are apt to give them a Figure in the Eye of the Village. A Country-Fellow distinguishes himself as much in the Church-yard, as a Citizen does upon the Change, the whole Parish-Politics being generally discuss'd in that Place either after Sermon or before the Bell rings.

My Friend S^r ROGER being a good Churchman, has beautified the Inside of his Church with several Texts of his own choosing: He has likewise given a handsome Pulpit-Cloth, and rail'd in the Communion-Table his own Expence. He has often told me that at his coming to his Estate he found the Parish very irregular; and that in order to make them kneel and join in the Responses, he gave every one of them a Hassock and a Common-prayer Book; and at the same Time employed an itinerant Singing-Master, who goes about the Country for that Purpose, to instruct them rightly in the Tunes of the Psalms; upon which they now very much value themselves, and indeed out-do most of the Country Churches that I have ever heard.

As Sir ROGER is Landlord to the whole Congregation, he keeps them in very good Order, and will suffer no Body to sleep in it besides himself; for if by Chance he has been surprized into a short Nap at Sermon, upon recovering out of it he stands up and looks about him, and if he sees any Body else nodding, either wakes them himself, or sends his Servant to them. Several other of the old Knight's Particularities break out upon these Occasions: Sometimes he will be lengthening out a Verse in the Singing-Psalms half a Minute after the rest of the Congregation have done with it; sometimes, when he is pleased with the Matter of his Devotion, he pronounces Amen three or four times to the same Prayer; and sometimes stands up when every Body else is upon their Knees, to count the Congregation, or see if any of his Tenants are misling.

I was Yesterday very much surprized to hear my old Friend, in the Midst of the Service, calling out to one John Mathews to mind what he was about, and not disturb the Congregation. This John Mathews it seems is remarkable for being an idle Fellow, and at that Time was kicking his Heels for his Diversion. This Authority of the Knight, though exerted in that odd Manner which accompanies him in all Circumstances of Life, has a very good Effect upon the Parish, who are not polite enough to see any thing ridiculous in his Behaviour; besides that, the general good Sense and Worthiness of his Character, make his Friends observe these little Singularities as Foils that rather set off than blemish his good Qualities.

As soon as the Sermon is finished, no Body presumes to stir till Sir ROGER is gone out of the Church. The Knight walks from his Seat in the Chancel, between a double Row of his Tenants, that stand bowing to him on each Side; and every now and then inquires how such an one's Wife or Mother, or Son, or Father do whom he does not see

see at Church; which is understood as a secret Reprimand to the Person that is absent.

The Chaplain has often told me, that upon a Catechizing-day, when Sir ROGER has been pleased with a Boy that answers well, he has ordered a Bible to be given him next Day for his Encouragement; and sometimes accompanies it with a Fitch of Bacon to his Mother. Sir ROGER has likewise added five Pounds a Year to the Clerk's Place; and that he may encourage the young Fellows to make themselves perfect in the Church-Service, has promised upon the Death of the present Incumbent, who is very old, to bestow it according to Merit.

The fair Understanding between Sir ROGER and his Chaplain, and their mutual Concurrence in doing Good, is the more remarkable, because the very next Village is famous for the Differences and Contentions that rise between the Parson and the 'Squire, who live in a perpetual State of War. The Parson is always preaching at the 'Squire, and the 'Squire to be revenged on the Parson never comes to Church. The 'Squire has made all his Tenants Atheists and Tithe-Stealers; while the Parson instructs them every Sunday in the Dignity of his Order, and insinuates to them in almost every Sermon, that he is a better Man than his Patron. In short, Matters are come to such an Extremity, that the 'Squire has not said his Prayers either in publick or private this half Year; and that the Parson threatens him, if he does not mend his Manners, to pray for him in the Face of the whole Congregation.

Feuds of this Nature, though too frequent in the Country, are very fatal to the ordinary People; who are so used to be dazzled with Riches, that they pay as much Deference to the Understanding of a Man of an Estate, as of a Man of Learning; and are very hardly brought to regard any Truth, how important soever it may be, that is preached to them, when they know there are several Men of five hundred a Year who do not believe it.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Gown Ware-house, removed from Baker's Coffee-house to Freeman's Yard in Cornhill near the Royal Exchange. Where may be had Gowns for Men and Women from 7l. 10s. to 13l. each, the Silks, Stuffs and Gallies they are made of are bought at publick Sales of the Cons that fail'd. Where Ladies may be furnish'd with all Sorts of Quilted Petticoats, and Canvas hoop'd, and the newest patterned Petticoats, at 5s. a Piece, the Price being set on each Gown. N. B. This was the Ware-house of Mr. Daniel Defoe.

At Mortlake in Surrey, near the lower Road to Richmond, is to be let a very good Brick House, well fenced and furnish'd, with Coach-house, Stables, and other Out-houses; Gardens and Ground-walled in, and well planted with the choicest of Fruit-Trees, back of Greens, the Fruit being worth more than half the Rent of the House. Inquire of Mr. Burr, Upholder, at the Three Pillars in St. Paul's Church-yard, or of Mr. James Cooke, Carver, in Mortlake, N. B. The Furniture of the said House will be dispos'd of therewith if desired.

There is to be Sold at very low Rates at Mr. Everett's, Watch-maker, at the Unicorn and 1731 up one Pair of Scizars near Strand-Bridge, all sorts of Muslin Cravats and Hollands, and Cambricks for Handkerchiefs, being the Goods of several persons that fail'd. The Cravats are put up 3 in a Paper, and the price mark'd up on each Piece.

An Infallible Electuary for Coughs and Colds.

Which immediately and safely cures them to advantage, takes away all Wheezing, Shortness of Breath, difficulty of Breathing, Soreness or Rawness of the Stomach or Wind-pipe; is Healing and Balsamick, cures gentle and acute Inflammations, reduces all manner of Disorders of the Lungs, preserving them entire, dissolves and cures the Phthisick and Asthma to a Miracle, also Catarrhs or Defluxions of Rheum, &c. Its Noble Virtues are inexpressible, it cures effectually and quickly cures all sorts of Coughs, Colics and Disorders of the Breast and Lungs to a Wonder; 'tis not to be equal'd. Price 2s. 6d. a Pot. With Directions. Sold only at Mr. Pains's Toy-shop, at the Angel and Crown in St. Paul's Church-yard, near Chancery-lane.

A most incomparable Paste for the Hæmorrhoids, far exceeding any thing ever yet in Print: It makes them delicately white, sleek and plump; fortifies them against the scorching Heat of the Fire or Sun, and Sharpness of the Wind. A Hand cannot be so spoil'd but the Use of it will recover them. Sold only at Mr. Allcraft's, Toy-shop, over against the Royal Exchange, at 1s. 6d. a Pot, with Directions. Where is sold the excellent German Powder for the Scoury in the Gums and Teeth, which by only flogging them every Morning, whitens and fastens the Teeth to a Miracle, at 1s. a Scale.

Just publish'd,

The NATURE of MAN. A Poem. In three Books. Printed for Sam. Buckley in Little-Britain; and sold by S. Crouch in Cornhill, J. Churchill in Paternoster-row, D. Midwinter in St. Paul's Church-yard, Jacob Tonson over against Chancery-lane in the Strand, and A. Baldwin in Warwick-Lane.

Just Publish'd,

The Passion of Sappho, and Feast of Alexander: Set to Musick by Mr. Thomas Clayton, as it is performed at his House in York Buildings. Printed for Jacob Tonson at Shakespeare's Head over against Chancery-lane in the Strand.

The Art of English Poetry, containing, I. Rules for making Verses. II. A Collection of the most natural, agreeable, and sublime Thoughts, viz. Allusions, Similes, Descriptions and Characters of Persons and Things that are to be found in the best English Poets. III. A Dictionary or Rhymes. By Edward Bysshe, Gent. The Fourth Edition, Rev. Printed for Sam. Buckley, at the Dolphin in Little-Britain, and Sold by the Booksellers.

Letters to a Nobleman, from a Gentleman travelling through Holland, Flanders and Brabant: With a Description of most of the Towns lately recovered from the French in Flanders, as also of the Courts of Versailles and St. Germain. Printed for D. Midwinter at the 3 Crowns in St. Paul's Church-yard.

An Essay concerning Hotzane Understanding: In 4 Books. Written by John Locke, Gent. The 6th Edition with large Additions, in 2 Vols. Printed for A. and J. Churchill at the Black-Swan in Paternoster-row.

The Ingenious and Diverting Letters of the Lady's Travels into Spain: Describing the Devotions, Manners, Humours, Customs, Laws, Militia, Trade, Diet, and recreations of that people. The 7th Edition with Additions. Printed for S. Crouch at the Corner of Pope's-head-Alley in Cornhill.

Grammatica Anglo-Saxonica ex Hicceano Linguarum Septentrionalium Theſauro excerpta. Item Vocabularium Anglo-Saxonum Gul. Somneri. Oxoniae in theatro Sheldoniano 89. Prostant venales apud W. Imsy ad Inſignia Principis in Cœmenterio D. Pauli. Londini.

The 6th Edition of Batt upon Batt, a Poem upon the Parts, Patience, and Pains of Barth, Kemptler, Clerk, poet, Cutler of Holy-Rood Parish in Southampton, by a Person of Quality: To which is annex'd the Villon, wherein is described Batt's Person and Ingenuity; with an Account of the ancient and present State of Southampton, by the same Author: Dedicated to the Gentry of Hampshire, &c. Printed for Sam. Crouch over against the Royal Exchange in Cornhill.

Anthropologia Nova; or, A New System of Anatomy. Describing the Animal Oeconomy, and a Short Rationale of many Distempers incident to Humane Bodies. In which are inserted divers Anatomical Discoveries, and Medicinal Observations, with the History of the Parts. Illustrated with above 80 Figures, drawn after the Life: And to every Chapter a Syllabus of the Parts described, for the Instruction of young Anatomists. By James Drake, M. D. in two Vols 8vo. Printed for W. Imsy at the Printer's Arms in St. Paul's Church-yard.

Just Publish'd,

Hadibras in Three Parts; Written in the Time of the late Wars. To this Edition is added Annotations to the Third Part, with a complete Index to the whole, never before Printed. Illustrated with 18 Historical Copper Cuts besides the Author's Effigies, all neatly Engrav'd by the best Artists. Price Bound 5s. Printed for G. Sawbridge at the Golden Flower-de-Luce in Little-Britain. N. B. This Edition is in large Octavo, Printed with a large Letter upon a Superfine Demy Paper.

LONDON: Printed for Sam. Buckley, at the Dolphin in Little-Britain; and Sold by A. Baldwin in Warwick-Lane; where Advertisements are taken in; as also by Charles Little, Perfumer, at the Corner of Beaufort-Buildings in that it contains anything more than what was supposed to be in those of a scantier make, we are wonderfully at a loss about it.

The women give out, in defense of these wide bottoms, that they are airy, and very proper for the season; but this I look upon to be only a pretence, and a piece of art, for it is well known we have not had a more moderate summer these many years, so that it is certain the heat they complain of cannot be in the weather. Besides, I would fain ask these tender-constituted ladies why they should require more cooling than their mothers before them.

I find several speculative persons are of opinion that our sex has of late years been very saucy, and that the hoop petticoat is made use of to keep us at a distance. It is most certain that a woman's honour cannot be better entrenched than after this manner, in circle within circle, amidst such a variety of outworks and lines of circumvallation.¹ A female who is thus invested in whalebone is sufficiently secured against the approaches of an ill-bred fellow, and might as well think of Sir George Etheridge's way of making love in a tub,² as in the midst of so many hoops.

Among these various conjectures, there are men of superstitious tempers who look upon the hoop petticoat as a kind of prodigy.³ Some will have it that it portends the downfall of the French King, and observe that the farthingale appeared in England a little before the ruin of the Spanish Monarchy.⁴ Others are of opinion that it foretells battle and bloodshed, and believe it of the same prognostication as the tail of a blazing star. For my part,

I am apt to think it is a sign that multitudes are coming into the world rather than going out of it.⁵

The first time I saw a lady dressed in one of these petticoats, I could not forbear blaming her in my own thoughts for walking abroad when she was so near her time,⁶ but soon recovered myself out of my error when I found all the modish part of the sex as far gone as herself. It is generally thought some crafty women have thus betrayed their companions into hoops, that they might make them accessory to their own concealments, and by that means escape the censure of the world,⁷ as wary generals have sometimes dressed two or three dozen of their friends in their own habit,⁸ that they might not draw upon themselves any particular attacks from the enemy. The strutting petticoat smoothes all distinctions, levels the mother with the daughter, and sets maids and matrons, wives and widows, upon the same bottom. In the meanwhile, I cannot but be troubled to see so many well-shaped innocent virgins bloated up and walking up and down like big-bellied women.

Should this fashion get among the ordinary people, our public ways would be so crowded that we should want street-room. Several congregations of the best fashion find themselves already very much straitened, and if the mode increase I wish it may not drive many ordinary women into meetings and conventicles.⁹ Should our sex at the same time take it into their heads to wear trunk breeches¹⁰ (as who knows what their indignation at this female treatment may drive them to) a man and his wife would fill a whole pew.

outworks Outer defensive structures; circumvallation Surrounding fortification.

² Sir George ... a tub In George Etherege's play The Comical Revenge; or, Love in a Tub (1664), a degenerate Frenchman is made to wear a large barrel.

³ prodigy I.e., omen.

⁴ farthingale Stiffened petticoat shaped by a wire or whalebone frame. It became popular in the English court in the mid-sixteenth century; ruin of ... Monarchy The Spanish monarchy went bankrupt in 1557.

⁵ a sign that ... of it I.e., a sign of many impending births, as all the wearers of hoop petticoats must be pregnant.

⁶ so near her time So far along in her pregnancy.

⁷ It is ... the world This may be a serious assertion; the origins of the hoop petticoat were not known, and one rumored possibility was that the style was originated by a woman who needed to conceal an illegitimate pregnancy.

⁸ habit I.e., uniform.

⁹ straitened Narrowly confined; mode Fashion; meetings and conventicles Secret meetings of religious nonconformists (into which people would be forced because there was no room in the churches).

¹⁰ trunk breeches Men's hose covering the upper half of the legs, padded or folded so that the fabric puffed out from the body. This style was fashionable in the last half of the sixteenth century.

You know, sir, it is recorded of Alexander the Great¹ that in his Indian expedition he buried several suits of armour which by his directions were made much too big for any of his soldiers, in order to give posterity an extraordinary idea of him, and make them believe he had commanded an army of giants. I am persuaded that if one of the present petticoats happens to be hung up in any repository of curiosities, it will lead into the same error the generations that lie some removes from us—unless we can believe our posterity will think so disrespectfully of their great-grandmothers, that they made themselves monstrous to appear amiable.

When I survey this new-fashioned rotunda² in all its parts, I cannot but think of the old philosopher who after having entered into an Egyptian temple and looked about for the idol of the place, at length discovered a little black monkey enshrined in the midst of it, upon which he could not forbear crying out (to the great scandal of the worshippers), "What a magnificent palace is here for such a ridiculous inhabitant!"

Though you have taken a resolution in one of your papers to avoid descending to particularities of dress, I believe you will not think it below you, on so extraordinary an occasion, to unhoop the fair sex and cure this fashionable timpani that is got among them. I am apt to think the petticoat will shrink of its own accord at your first coming to town; at least a touch of your pen will make it contract itself, like the sensitive plant,³ and by that means oblige several who are either terrified or astonished at this portentous novelty, and among the rest,

Your humble servant, &c.

¹ Alexander the Great Ancient king who conquered a vast empire stretching from Greece to India.

² rotunda Round building, usually with a dome.

³ sensitive plant Plant with leaves that fold up when they are touched.

Cover of the first issue of The Gentleman's Magazine, January 1731. The first successful periodical that was truly miscellaneous in content, The Gentleman's Magazine began a trend of general-interest journals that eventually resulted in the development of magazines as they exist today. The Magazine's founder, printer Edward Cave, employed his own writers for original articles, but he also filled his pages with material taken from newspapers, recent books, and other periodicals. The title page lists some of the publications he used as sources, arrayed on either side of a picture of the gatehouse where the magazine was created and sold.

The Gentleman's Magazine reigned for some time as the most widely circulated periodical in print. By 1741, ten years after the first issue was released, Samuel Johnson (who wrote for the magazine) reported that it was "read as far as the English language extends." It continued publication until 1914.

552. A Song for two Voices. As sung at both Playhouses.

God save great GEORGE our king, Long live our noble king.

God save great GEORGE our king, Long live our noble king.

God save the king. Send him vic - to - ri - ous, Happy and glo - ri - ous,

God save the king. Send him vic - to - ri - ous, Happy and glo - ri - ous,

Long to reign o - ver us, God save the king.

Long to reign o - ver us, God save the king.

2.
O Lord our God arise,
Scatter his enemies,
And make them fall;
Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks,
On him our hopes we fix,
O save us all.

3.
Thy choicest gifts in store
On George be pleas'd to pour,
Long may he reign;
May he defend our laws,
And ever give us cause,
To say with heart and voice
God save the king.

"God Save Our Lord the King: A New Song Set for Two Voices," from The Gentleman's Magazine, October 1745. Eighteenth-century magazines often brought together what to a present-day mind may seem quite disparate materials. Alongside the text of a political speech, a list of new books, or a scientific article, an issue of a magazine might also include a song.

The inclusion of music as well as lyrics when songs were published in periodicals was a common practice; one notable example is the publication of this early version of "God Save the King" in The Gentleman's Magazine. Though scholars dispute the provenance of the anthem, the version that was regarded as "a new song" in 1745—and that The Gentleman's Magazine helped to popularize—is very close to the tune (and the words) that came to be accepted in the nineteenth century as the unofficial national anthem. The words of the second and third stanzas as printed here remain, with only small modifications ("on her we pour" for "on George we pour," etc.), those of the standard version of "God Save the Queen"—though they are only rarely sung.

from Eliza Haywood, The Female Spectator Book 1 [Erminia] (April 1744)

Eliza Haywood was one of the most popular novelists of the eighteenth century, but her periodical The Female Spectator (1744–46), published anonymously, was even more successful than her novels. Like the earlier Spectator referred to in the title, its stated purpose was the moral improvement of its readers. The Female Spectator was issued monthly—less often than many other essay periodicals—and was relatively longer, printed in books instead of on unbound sheets. Each issue contained one long, loosely organized essay blending social commentary with personal advice; letters from real or imaginary readers; and morally instructive stories such as the one below.

... [Erminia] and her brother were the only issue of a very happy marriage, and both shared equally the tenderness of their indulgent parents. They were educated in the strictest rudiments of piety and virtue, and had something so innately good in their dispositions as made the practice of those duties which to others seem most severe, to them a pleasure. The family lived in the country and came not to London but once in two or three years, and then stayed but a short time, till, the young gentleman having finished his studies at Cambridge, it was thought proper he should see more of the world than he could possibly do in that retired¹ part. But fearing he should fall into the vices of the age, in case he were left too much to himself, they resolved on removing to town in order to have him still under their own eye. ...

Soon after their arrival winter came on, and wherever either [Erminia] or her brother went, nothing was talked on but the masquerade; neither of them had ever seen one, and the eagerness they observed in others excited a curiosity in them. Their parents would not oppose the inclination they expressed, and consented they should go together, but gave their son a strict charge to be watchful over his sister, and never to quit sight of her till he brought her home to them again. Though this was an entertainment unknown in England in their gay time of life, and, consequently, they were strangers to the methods practised at it, yet having heard somewhat of the dangers, they repeated over and over the same injunction to the young gentleman, who assured them he would take the same care as if themselves were present.

Alas! he little knew how impracticable it was to keep his promise; they were no sooner entered than both were bewildered amidst the promiscuous² assembly—the strange habits,³ the hurry, the confusion quite distracted their attention. They kept close to each other, indeed, for some time, but were soon separated by a crowd that came rushing between them, some accosting the brother, others the sister. Those who talked to them easily found they were strangers to the conversation of the place, and whispering it about, our young country gentry served as butts⁴ for the company to level all the arrows of their wit against.

Erminia had lost her brother for a considerable time, and was encompassed by persons of both sexes whose mode of speech was neither pleasing to her, nor did she know how to answer; at last, the sight of a blue domino,⁵ which was the habit he went in, revived her, and she ran to the person who wore it, and catching fast hold of him, “Dear brother,” (cried she) “let us go home, I have been frightened to death by those noisy people yonder. I wonder what pleasure anybody can take in being here.”

The person she accosted made no reply, but taking her under the arm, conducted her out as she had desired, and went with her into a hackney coach. Little suspecting the accident that had befallen her, she attended not to what orders he gave the coachman, and, glad to find herself out of a place which for her had so few charms, entertained her supposed brother with a repetition of what had been said to her till the coach stopped at the door of a great house. As it was not yet light, she distinguished it not from their own, and innocently jumped out, and was within the entry before butts Targets.

² promiscuous Indiscriminately mixed.

³ habits Costumes.

⁵ domino Costume commonly worn at masquerades, comprised of a hooded cloak and a mask.

she discovered her mistake; but as soon as she did, "Bless me," (cried she) "where have you brought me, brother?" She followed him, however, upstairs, where he, pulling off his vizard, discovered¹ a face she had never seen before.

Never was surprise and terror greater than that which now seized the heart of this unfortunate young lady. She wept, she prayed, she conjured him by everything that is called sacred or worthy of veneration, to suffer her to depart. But he was one to whom, had she been less beautiful, her innocence was a sufficient charm. The more averse and shocked she seemed at the rude behaviour with which he immediately began to treat her, the more were his desires inflamed, and, having her in his power, and in a house where all her shrieks and cries were as unavailing as her tears and entreaties, he satiated, by the most barbarous force, his base inclinations, and for a moment's joy to himself was the eternal ruin of a poor creature whose ignorance of the world and the artifices of mankind alone had betrayed to him.

The cruel conquest gained, he was at a loss how to dispose of his prey; a thousand times she begged he would complete the villainy he had begun, and kill the wretch he had made; but this was what neither his safety, nor perhaps his principle, wicked as he was, would permit him to do. He easily found she was a girl of condition, and doubted not but she had friends who would revenge the injury had been done her, could they by any means discover the author; he therefore, after having in vain endeavoured to pacify her and prevail on her to comply with his desires of holding a secret correspondence with him, compelled her to let him bind a handkerchief over her eyes, that she might not be able to describe either the house or street where she had been abused; then put her into a hackney coach, which he ordered to drive into an obscure, dirty lane in the Strand,² near the water side, where he made her be let down, and immediately drove away with all the speed the horses could make. . . .

[Erminia returns to her family and is persuaded to tell them what has happened to her.]

Never was so disconsolate a family, and the more so, as they could by no means discover the brutal author of their misfortune; the precautions he had taken rendered all their search in vain, and when some days after they prevailed on Erminia to go with them in a coach almost throughout all London, yet could she not point out either the house or street where her ravisher had carried her.

To fill the measure of her woes, a young gentleman arrived in town who long had loved her, and had the approbation³ of her friends, and for whom she also felt all of that passion that can inspire a virtuous mind; he had by some business been prevented from accompanying the family in their removal, but was now come full of the hopes of having his desires completed by a happy marriage with the sweet Erminia.

Melancholy reverse of fate! Instead of being received with open arms and that cheerful welcome he had been accustomed to and had reason to expect, the most heavy gloom appeared on all the faces of those he was permitted to see; but Erminia no sooner heard of his arrival than she shut herself up in her chamber, and would by no means be prevailed upon to appear before him. To excuse her absence, they told him she was indisposed; but this seemed all pretence, because the freedom with which they had always lived together might very well have allowed him the privilege of visiting her in her chamber. He complained of this alteration in their behaviour, and doubted not, at first, but it was occasioned by the preference they gave to some new rival. The true reason, however, could not be kept so much a secret, but that it was whispered about, and he soon got a hint of it. How sensible a shock it must give him may easily be conceived, but he got the better of it, and after a very little reflection went to her father, told him the afflicting news he had heard, but withal assured him that as his love for Erminia was chiefly founded on her virtue, an act of force could not be esteemed any breach of it, and was still ready to marry her, if she would consent.

This generosity charmed the whole family, but Erminia could not think of accepting the offer; the more she found him worthy of her affections in her state of innocence, the less could she support the shame of being his in the condition she now was. She told her parents that she had taken a firm resolution never to marry, and begged their permission to retire to an aunt, who was married to an old clergyman and lived in one of the most remote counties in England. Dear as her presence was, they found something so truly noble in her way of thinking that they would not oppose it; and even her lover, in spite of himself, could not forbear applauding what gave a thousand daggers to his heart.

¹ vizard Mask; discovered Uncovered.

² the Strand London street known in the eighteenth century for its theaters, taverns, and brothels.

³ approbation Approval.

Erminia in a short time departed for her country residence; nothing was ever more mournful than the leave she took of her parents and brother; but not all the entreaties of her lover, by messages and letters, could gain so far upon her modesty as to prevail on her to see him; she sent him, however, a letter full of the most tender acknowledgements of his love and generosity, and with this he was obliged to be content.

It is not every woman would have resented such an injury in the same manner with Erminia, and it must be confessed that her notions of honour and virtue had somewhat superlatively delicate in them. What a loss then to the world to be deprived of so amiable an example, as she would have doubtless proved, of conjugal truth, tenderness, and a strict observance of every duty that men so much desire to find in her they make a partner for life. How can her brutal ravisher reflect, as it is impossible but he sometimes must, on the mischiefs he has occasioned, without horrors such as must render life a burden! Though he yet is hid in darkness, and left no traces by which the public may point the villain out and treat him with the abhorrence he deserves, his own thoughts must surely be the avengers of his crime and make him more truly wretched than any exterior punishment could do. . . .

Samuel Johnson, The Rambler No. 114 [On Capital Punishment] (20 April 1751)

Samuel Johnson's famous essay on capital punishment was written at a time when the number of capital crimes in English law was increasing rapidly. In 1688 there were 50 crimes that could incur the death penalty under English law; by 1765 there were more than three times that many. It became a capital offense not only to commit murder or treason but also to shoplift, to cut down trees in a garden, or to pick pocket more than a shilling. However, not everyone who committed such crimes was killed. Judges and juries were reluctant to convict minor criminals of capital crimes—even when they were obviously guilty—and many of those who were sentenced to death received royal pardons before the sentence was carried out.

————— Audi,

Nulla unquam de morte hominis cunctatio longa est.

—JUVENAL, Satires, 6.220–21

————— When man's life is in debate,

The judge can ne'er too long deliberate.

—DRYDEN

Power and superiority are so flattering and delightful that, fraught with temptation and exposed to danger as they are, scarcely any virtue is so cautious, or any prudence so timorous, as to decline them. Even those that have most reverence for the laws of right are pleased with showing that not fear, but choice, regulates their behavior; and would be thought to comply, rather than obey. We love to overlook the boundaries which we do not wish to pass; and, as the Roman satirist¹ remarks, he that has no design to take the life of another, is yet glad to have it in his hands.

From the same principle, tending yet more to degeneracy and corruption, proceeds the desire of investing lawful authority with terror, and governing by force rather than persuasion. Pride is unwilling to believe the necessity of assigning any other reason than her own will, and would rather maintain the most equitable claims by violence and penalties than descend from the dignity of command to dispute and expostulation.

It may, I think, be suspected that this political arrogance has sometimes found its way into legislative assemblies and mingled with deliberations upon property and life. A slight perusal of the laws by which the measures of vindictive and coercive justice are established will discover so many disproportions between crimes and punishments, such capricious distinctions of guilt, and such confusion of remissness¹ and severity, as can scarcely be believed to have been produced by public wisdom, sincerely and calmly studious of public happiness.

¹ Roman satirist Juvenal, in his Satires 10.96–97.

The learned, the judicious, the pious Boerhaave² relates that he never saw a criminal dragged to execution without asking himself, "Who knows whether this man is not less culpable than me?" On the days when the prisons of this city are emptied into the grave, let every spectator of the dreadful procession put the same question to his own heart. Few among those that crowd in thousands to the legal massacre and look with carelessness, perhaps with triumph, on the utmost exacerbations of human misery, would then be able to return without horror and dejection. For who can congratulate himself upon a life passed without some act more mischievous to the peace or prosperity of others than the theft of a piece of money?

It has been always the practice, when any particular species of robbery becomes prevalent and common, to endeavour its suppression by capital denunciations.³ Thus, one generation of malefactors⁴ is commonly cut off, and their successors are frightened into new expedients; the art of thievery is augmented with greater variety of fraud, and subtilized to higher degrees of dexterity and more occult⁵ methods of conveyance. The law then renews the pursuit in the heat of anger, and overtakes the offender again with death. By this practice, capital inflictions are multiplied, and crimes very different in their degrees of enormity are equally subjected to the severest punishment that man has the power of exercising upon man.

The lawgiver is undoubtedly allowed to estimate the malignity⁶ of an offence not merely by the loss or pain which single acts may produce, but by the general alarm and anxiety arising from the fear of mischief and insecurity of possession. He therefore exercises the right which societies are supposed to have over the lives of those that compose them, not simply to punish a transgression, but to maintain order and preserve quiet; he enforces those laws with severity that are most in danger of violation, as the commander of a garrison doubles the guard on that side which is threatened by the enemy.

This method has been long tried, but tried with so little success that rapine⁷ and violence are hourly increasing. Yet few seem willing to despair of its efficacy, and of those who employ their speculations upon the present corruption of the people, some propose the introduction of more horrid, lingering and terrific punishments; some are inclined to accelerate the executions; some to discourage pardons; and all seem to think that lenity has given confidence to wickedness, and that we can only be rescued from the talons of robbery by inflexible rigour and sanguinary⁸ justice.

Yet since the right of setting an uncertain and arbitrary value upon life has been disputed, and since experience of past times gives us little reason to hope that any reformation will be effected by a periodical havoc⁹ of our fellow beings, perhaps it will not be useless to consider what consequences might arise from relaxations of the law and a more rational and equitable adaptation of penalties to offences.

Death is, as one of the ancients observes, τὸ τὸν φόβον ἢ τοῦ φοβερώτατον, "of dreadful things the most dreadful"; an evil beyond which nothing can be threatened by sublunary¹⁰ power, or feared from human enmity or vengeance. This terror should, therefore, be reserved as the last resort of authority, as the strongest and most operative of prohibitory sanctions, and placed before the treasure of life, to guard from invasion what cannot be restored. To equal robbery with murder is to reduce murder to robbery, to confound in common minds the gradations of iniquity, and incite the commission of a greater crime to prevent the detection of a less. If only murder were punished with death, very few robbers would stain their hands in blood; but when by remissness Negligence.

¹ Boerhaave Doctor and intellectual Herman Boerhaave (1668–1738), whom Johnson greatly admired.

² by capital denunciations I.e., by trying criminals for capital offenses.

³ malefactors Criminals.

occult Secret.

malignity Evil nature.

rapine Plunder.

⁸ sanguinary Bloody.

⁹ havoc Devastation.

¹⁰ sublunary Of the material world.

the last act of cruelty no new danger is incurred, and greater security may be obtained, upon what principle shall we bid them forbear?

It may be urged that the sentence is often mitigated to simple robbery;¹ but surely this is to confess that our laws are unreasonable in our own opinion; and, indeed, it may be observed that all but murderers have, at their last hour, the common sensations of mankind pleading in their favour.

From this conviction of the inequality of the punishment to the offence proceeds the frequent solicitation of pardons. They who would rejoice at the correction of a thief are yet shocked at the thought of destroying him. His crime shrinks to nothing, compared with his misery; and severity defeats itself by exciting pity.

The gibbet,² indeed, certainly disables those who die upon it from infesting the community; but their death seems not to contribute more to the reformation of their associates than any other method of separation. A thief seldom passes much of his time in recollection or anticipation, but from robbery hastens to riot, and from riot to robbery; nor, when the grave closes upon his companion, has any other care than to find another.

The frequency of capital punishments therefore rarely hinders the commission of a crime, but naturally and commonly prevents its detection, and is, if we proceed only upon prudential principles, chiefly for that reason to be avoided. Whatever may be urged by casuists³ or politicians, the greater part of mankind, as they can never think that to pick the pocket and to pierce the heart is equally criminal, will scarcely believe that two malefactors so different in guilt can be justly doomed to the same punishment; nor is the necessity of submitting the conscience to human laws so plainly evinced, so clearly stated, or so generally allowed, but that the pious, the tender, and the just, will always scruple to concur with the community in an act which their private judgment cannot approve.

He who knows not how often rigorous laws produce total impunity, and how many crimes are concealed and forgotten for fear of hurrying the offender to that state in which there is no repentance, has conversed very little with mankind. And whatever epithets of reproach or contempt this compassion may incur from those who confound cruelty with firmness, I know not whether any wise man would wish it less powerful, or less extensive.

If those whom the wisdom of our laws has condemned to die had been detected in their rudiments⁴ of robbery, they might by proper discipline and useful labour have been disentangled from their habits; they might have escaped all the temptations to subsequent crimes, and passed their days in reparation and penitence; and detected they might all have been, had the prosecutors been certain that their lives would have been spared. I believe every thief will confess that he has been more than once seized and dismissed; and that he has sometimes ventured upon capital crimes because he knew that those whom he injured would rather connive at his escape than cloud their minds with the horrors of his death.

All laws against wickedness are ineffectual unless some will inform, and some will prosecute; but till we mitigate the penalties for mere violations of property, information will always be hated, and prosecution dreaded. The heart of a good man cannot but recoil at the thought of punishing a slight injury with death; especially when he remembers that the thief might have procured safety by another crime, from which he was restrained only by his remaining virtue.

The obligations to assist the exercise of public justice are indeed strong; but they will certainly be overpowered by tenderness for life. What is punished with severity contrary to our ideas of adequate retribution will be seldom discovered;⁵ and multitudes will be suffered to advance from crime to crime till they deserve death, because if they had been sooner prosecuted, they would have suffered death before they deserved it.

¹ simple robbery I.e., petty larceny. Grand larceny (theft of anything with a value over one shilling) was punishable by death, while petty larceny (under one shilling) incurred lesser punishments; judges often deliberately underestimated the cost of stolen goods for this reason.

² gibbet Gallows. Hanging was the most common method of execution.

³ casuists People who reason cleverly but misleadingly.

⁴ rudiments Beginnings.

⁵ discovered Revealed.

This scheme of invigorating the laws by relaxation, and extirpating¹ wickedness by lenity, is so remote from common practice that I might reasonably fear to expose it to the public, could it be supported only by my own observations: I shall, therefore, by ascribing it to its author, Sir Thomas More,² endeavour to procure it that attention which I wish always paid to prudence, to justice, and to mercy.

¹ extirpating Eliminating.

² Sir Thomas More In the fictional society of More's Utopia (1516), capital punishment is used in very few circumstances.

JAMES THOMSON

1700 – 1748

Author of The Seasons, an innovative nature poem which became the eighteenth century's most popular work of poetry, James Thomson also published other poems and six plays. A member of a literary circle consisting of English and Scottish writers, many of whom played an active part in the opposition politics of the day, Thomson is perhaps now most often remembered for writing the words of what has become Britain's unofficial anthem, "Rule Britannia." This originated as a song in Alfred, A Masque (1740), which Thomson wrote with David Mallet to celebrate the birth of the Prince of Wales's first child, Princess Augusta. It is The Seasons, however, that secured his place as a leading poet of the early eighteenth century, as an influence on the Romantic poets of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and as a major figure in Scottish literary tradition.

The son of a Presbyterian minister, James Thomson was born on 11 September 1700 and lived in Southdean in the south of Scotland until 1715. His early education included instruction in the Shorter Catechism and the Bible from his father, traditional Border songs and ballads from his mother, and the classics at Jedburgh Grammar School—all influences which surface in his work. After his father's death in 1716, Thomson's family moved to Edinburgh where James studied at the University of Edinburgh. Although Thomson completed the requisite four years, he did not take his degree. Planning to become a minister, he subsequently entered Divinity Hall in 1719 to begin a six-year course of study; that, too, he abandoned just before completion, moving to London in 1725.

Once in London, Thomson turned his attention more seriously to writing—Winter appeared in April 1726, and was an immediate publishing sensation. Thomson followed it with Summer (1727) and Spring (1728); "Autumn" first appeared as part of the collected The Seasons in 1730. In form The Seasons is a georgic, a poem about agricultural labor, the countryside, and the wealth produced there. The genre takes its name from Virgil's Georgics, written in Latin in the first century BCE and designed both as a farming manual for army veterans (who were issued with land as part of their retirement package) and also as a celebration of the natural riches produced by the land. This offered Thomson the opportunity to write on man's experience of Nature. Thomson returned repeatedly to The Seasons, publishing new editions in 1744 and again in 1746, each time increasing the poem's political and scientific content; the final version is substantially larger than that published in 1730.

During the years he was writing The Seasons, Thomson also worked as a tutor, initially to the son of a Scottish peer, Lord Binning. By May 1726 he was employed as a private tutor at a school run by hymn-writer and educator Isaac Watts, having already published Winter in April 1726; he remained at the school until November 1730, by which time he had published one play, Sophonisba (1730), a tribute to Newton entitled A Poem Sacred to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton (1727), and the remaining three seasons: Summer (1727), Spring (1728), and "Autumn" as part of the collected Seasons (1730).

In November 1730, Thomson accompanied the son of his patron, Lord Charles Talbot, on a grand tour of France and Italy that lasted over a year. His Continental experiences spawned another ambitious, albeit less-successful poem, Liberty, the five books of which follow the goddess of Liberty throughout the history of the civilized world (1735–36).

By 1735, Thomson had moved to Richmond, just outside of London, where he eventually met and fell in love with fellow-Scotswoman Elizabeth Young, sister-in-law of a neighbor. Thomson courted her for three years, and was devastated by her final refusal in 1745; some have suggested that the strength of his feelings over this relationship lent force to the writing of his most romantic and successful play, Tancred and Sigismunda (1745). Thomson's final poem, The Castle of Indolence (1748), written in Spenserian stanzas, was the product of fifteen years' labor. It explores the seductive qualities of idleness, and many critics have found ambivalence in its ultimate celebration of the regenerating force of hard work. The poet was acknowledged to be intimately familiar with the subject-matter of the poem; he was as well known for his indolence and his love of food and drink as he was for his generosity and good humor.

Thomson did not live to see his last play, Coriolanus (1746), performed on stage in 1749, for he died of a fever weeks before his forty-eighth birthday on 27 August 1748. In 1762 his friends and admirers, including George III, memorialized him by erecting a monument in Westminster Abbey's Poets' Corner, funded by the proceeds of a posthumous edition of his collected Works (1762).

Winter¹

See! Winter comes, to rule the varied year,
Sullen, and sad; with all his rising train,^{o group of attendants}
Vapours, and clouds, and storms: Be these my theme,
These, that exalt the soul to solemn thought,
5 And heavenly musing. Welcome kindred glooms!
Wished, wint'ry, horrors, hail! With frequent foot, Pleased, have I, in my cheerful morn of life,²
When, nursed by careless solitude, I lived,
And sung of Nature with unceasing joy,
10 Pleased, have I wandered through your rough domains;
Trod the pure, virgin snows, my self as pure:
Heard the winds roar, and the big torrent burst:
Or seen the deep, fermenting tempest brewed,
In the red, evening sky. Thus passed the time,
15 Till, through the opening chambers of the south,³
Looked out the joyous Spring, looked out, and smiled.

Winter Published in 1726, this is the first version of Winter and the first of the Seasons poems to appear.

² morn of life Youth.

³ chambers of the south Reference to the southern sky in Job 9:9: "Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south."

Thou too, inspirer of the toiling swain!⁴
Fair Autumn, yellow robed! I'll sing of thee,
Of thy last, tempered days, and sunny calms;
20 When all the golden hours are on the wing,
Attending thy retreat, and round thy wain,^{o wagon}
Slow-rolling, onward to the southern sky.

Behold! the well-poised hornet, hovering, hangs,
With quivering pinions,^o in the genial blaze; ^{wings}
25 Flies off, in airy circles: then returns,
And hums, and dances to the beating ray.
Nor shall the man, that, musing, walks alone,
And, heedless, strays within his radiant lists,^{o enclosed spaces}
Go unchastised away. Sometimes, a fleece
30 Of clouds, wide-scattering, with a lucid^o veil, ^{bright, clear}
Soft, shadow o'er th' unruffled face of heaven;
And, through their dewy sluices,⁵ shed the sun,
With tempered influence down. Then is the time
For those, whom Wisdom and whom Nature charm,
35 To steal themselves from the degenerate crowd,
And soar above this little scene of things:
To tread low-thoughted Vice beneath their feet:

¹ swain Country laborer, often a shepherd.

⁵ sluices Structures designed to regulate water.

To lay their passions in a gentle calm,
And woo lone Quiet, in her silent walks.

Now, solitary, and in pensive guise,
Oft let me wander o'er the russet mead,^o meadow
Or through the pining grove; where scarce is heard
One dying strain to cheer the woodman's toil:
Sad Philomel,¹ perchance, pours forth her plaint,^o lamentation
Far, through the withering copse.^o small wood

Meanwhile, the leaves
That, late, the forest clad with lively green,
Nipped by the drizzly night, and fallow-hued,
Fall, wavering, through the air; or shower amain,^o at full speed
Urged by the breeze, that sobs amid the boughs.
Then list'ning hares forsake the rustling woods,
And, starting at the frequent noise, escape
To the rough stubble, and the rushy fen.^o marsh
Then woodcocks, o'er the fluctuating main,²
That glimmers to the glimpses of the moon,
Stretch their long voyage to the woodland glade:
Where, wheeling with uncertain flight, they mock
The nimble fowler's^o aim. Now Nature droops; bird hunter's
Languish the living herbs with pale decay:
And all the various family of flowers
Their sunny robes resign. The falling fruits,
Through the still night, forsake the parent-bough,
That, in the first grey glances of the dawn,
Looks wild, and wonders at the wintry waste.^o desolate land

The year, yet pleasing, but declining fast,
Soft, o'er the secret soul, in gentle gales,
A philosophic melancholy breathes,
And bears the swelling thought aloft to heaven.
Then forming fancy rouses to conceive,
What never mingled with the vulgar's^o dream: uneducated
Then wake the tender pang, the pitying tear,
The sigh for suffering worth, the wish preferred^o put forward
For humankind, the joy to see them blessed,
And all the social offspring of the heart!

Oh! bear me then to high, embowering³ shades;
75 To twilight groves, and visionary vales;
To weeping grottos,^o and to hoary⁴ caves;
Where angel-forms are seen, and voices heard,
Sighed in low whispers, that abstract the soul,
From outward sense, far into worlds remote.

Now, when the western sun withdraws the day,
And humid evening, gliding o'er the sky,
In her chill progress checks the straggling beams,
And robs them of their gathered, vapoury prey,
Where marshes stagnate, and where rivers wind,
85 Cluster the rolling fogs, and swim along
The dusky-mantled lawn:^o then slow descend, open land
Once more to mingle with their wat'ry friends.
The vivid stars shine out, in radiant files;
And boundless ether⁵ glows; till the fair moon
90 Shows her broad visage, in the crimsoned east;
Now, stooping, seems to kiss the passing cloud:
Now, o'er the pure cerulean,^o rides sublime. sky-blue
Wide the pale deluge floats, with silver waves,
O'er the skied⁶ mountain, to the low-laid vale;
95 From the white rocks, with dim reflection, gleams,
And faintly glitters through the waving shades.

All night, abundant dews, unnoted, fall,
And, at return of morning, silver o'er
The face of Mother Earth; from every branch
100 Depending,^o tremble the translucent gems, dangling
And, quivering, seem to fall away, yet cling,
And sparkle in the sun, whose rising eye,
With fogs bedimmed, portends a beauteous day.

Now, giddy Youth, whom headlong passions fire,
105 Rouse the wild game, and stain the guiltless grove,
With violence, and death; yet call it sport,
To scatter ruin through the realms of love,

³ embowering Enclosed in trees.

⁴ hoary White or grey with mold.

⁵ ether Upper regions of space; the substance that comprises all the space beyond the moon.

⁶ skied Appearing to reach the sky.

¹ Philomel Nightingale. The daughter of the King of Athens. Philomela was transformed into a nightingale after being pursued and raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, King of Thrace.

² main Wide expanse.

And peace, that thinks no ill: But these, the Muse,¹ Whose charity, unlimited, extends 110 As wide as Nature works, disdains to sing,
 Returning to her nobler theme in view—
 For, see! where Winter comes, himself, confessed,^o revealed
 Striding the gloomy blast. First rains obscure
 Drive through the mingling skies, with tempest foul;
 115 Beat on the mountain's brow, and shake the woods,
 That, sounding, wave below. The dreary plain
 Lies overwhelmed, and lost. The bellying clouds
 Combine, and deepening into night, shut up
 The day's fair face. The wanderers of heaven,²
 120 Each to his home, retire; save those that love
 To take their pastime in the troubled air,
 And, skimming, flutter round the dimply flood.
 The cattle, from th' untasted fields, return,
 And ask, with meaning low,^o their moo wonted^o stalls; customary 125 Or ruminat³ in the contiguous^o shade: neighboring Thither, the household, feathery people crowd,
 The crested cock, with all his female train,
 Pensive, and wet. Meanwhile, the cottage swain
 Hangs o'er th' enlivening blaze, and, taleful,^o there talkative
 130 Recounts his simple frolic: much he talks,
 And much he laughs, nor wrecks the storm that blows
 Without, and rattles on his humble roof.

At last, the muddy deluge pours along,
 Resistless, roaring; dreadful down it comes 135 From the chapt^o mountain, and the mossy wild, fissured
 Tumbling through rocks abrupt, and sounding far:
 Then o'er the sanded valley, floating, spreads,
 Calm, sluggish, silent; till again constrained,
 Betwixt two meeting hills, it bursts a way,
 140 Where rocks and woods o'erhang the turbid^o stream. muddy
 There gathering triple force, rapid, and deep,
 It boils, and wheels, and foams, and thunders through.

¹ Muse The Muses were nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, each of whom presided over and provided inspiration for an aspect of learning or the arts.

² wanderers of heaven Wild birds.

³ ruminat Meaning both "chew the cud" and "meditate."

Nature! great parent! whose directing hand
 Rolls round the seasons of the changeful year,
 145 How mighty! how majestic are thy works!
 With what a pleasing dread they swell the soul,
 That sees, astonished! and, astonished, sings!
 You too, ye Winds! that now begin to blow,
 With boisterous sweep, I raise my voice to you.
 150 Where are your stores,^o ye viewless beings! say! possessions
 Where your aerial magazines^o reserved warehouses
 Against the day of tempest perilous?
 In what untraveled country of the air,
 Hushed in still silence, sleep you, when 'tis calm?

Late, in the lowering⁴ sky, red, fiery streaks
 Begin to flush about; the reeling clouds
 Stagger with dizzy aim, as doubting yet
 Which master to obey: while rising, slow,
 Sad, in the leaden-coloured east, the moon
 160 Wears a bleak circle round her sullied orb.
 Then issues forth the storm, with loud control,
 And the thin fabric of the pillared air
 O'erturns, at once. Prone, on th' uncertain main,
 Descends th' ethereal force, and plows its waves,
 165 With dreadful rift: from the mid-deep appears,
 Surge after surge, the rising, wat'ry war.
 Whitening, the angry billows roll immense,
 And roar their terrors through the shuddering soul
 Of feeble Man, amidst their fury caught,
 170 And dashed upon his fate: Then, o'er the cliff,
 Where dwells the sea-mew,^o unconfined, they fly, seagull
 And, hurrying, swallow up the sterile shore.

The mountain growls; and all its sturdy sons
 Stoop to the bottom of the rocks they shade:
 175 Lone, on its midnight-side, and all aghast,
 The dark, wayfaring stranger, breathless, toils,
 And climbs against the blast—
 Low waves the rooted forest, vexed,^o and sheds disturbed
 What of its leafy honours yet remains.
 180 Thus, struggling through the dissipated grove,
 The whirling tempest raves along the plain;
 And, on the cottage thatched or lordly dome^o mansion
 Keen-fastening, shakes 'em to the solid base.

⁴ lowering Dark and threatening.

Sleep, frightened, flies; the hollow chimney howls,
The windows rattle, and the hinges creak.

Then too, they say, through all the burdened air
Long groans are heard, shrill sounds, and distant sighs,
That, murmured by the demon of the night,
Warn the devoted wretch of woe, and death!
Wild uproar lords it wide: the clouds commixed,
With stars, swift-gliding, sweep along the sky.
All nature reels. But hark! the Almighty speaks:
Instant, the chidden^o storm begins to pant, rebuked
And dies, at once, into a noiseless calm.

As yet, 'tis midnight's reign; the weary clouds,
Slow-meeting, mingle into solid gloom:
Now, while the drowsy world lies lost in sleep,
Let me associate with the low-browed Night,
And Contemplation, her sedate compeer;^o companion
Let me shake off th' intrusive cares of day,
And lay the meddling senses all aside.

And now, ye lying vanities of life!
You ever-tempting, ever-cheating train!
Where are you now? and what is your amount?^o significance
Vexation, disappointment, and remorse.
Sad, sickening thought! and yet, deluded Man,
A scene of wild, disjointed visions past,
And broken slumbers, rises, still resolved,
With new-flushed hopes, to run your giddy round.

Father of light, and life! Thou Good Supreme!
O! teach me what is good! teach me thy self!
Save me from folly, vanity and vice,
From every low pursuit! and feed my soul,
With knowledge, conscious peace, and virtue pure,
Sacred, substantial, never-fading bliss!

Lo! from the livid east, or piercing north,
Thick clouds ascend, in whose capacious womb
A vapoury deluge lies, to snow congealed:
Heavy, they roll their fleecy world along;
And the sky saddens with th' impending storm.
Through the hushed air, the whitening shower descends,
At first, thin-wavering; till, at last, the flakes
Fall broad, and wide, and fast, dimming the day

With a continual flow. See! sudden, hoared,
225 The woods beneath the stainless burden bow,
Blackening, along the mazy^o stream it melts; winding
Earth's universal face, deep-hid, and chill,
Is all one dazzling waste. The labourer-ox
Stands covered o'er with snow, and then demands
230 The fruit of all his toil. The fowls of heaven,
Tamed by the cruel season, crowd around
The winnowing¹ store, and claim the little boon,^o favor
That Providence allows. The foodless wilds
Pour forth their brown inhabitants; the hare,
235 Though timorous^o of heart, and hard beset fearful
By death in various forms—dark snares, and dogs,
And more un pitying men—the garden seeks,
Urged on by fearless want. The bleating kind^o sheep
Eye the bleak heavens, and next, the glistening Earth, 240 With looks of dumb despair; then sad, dispersed,
Dig for the withered herb, through heaps of snow.

Now, shepherds, to your helpless charge be kind;
Baffle^o the raging year, and fill their pens defeat
With food, at will: lodge them below the blast,
245 And watch them strict; for from the bellowing east,
In this dire season, oft the whirlwind's wing
Sweeps up the burden of whole wintry plains
In one fierce blast, and o'er th' unhappy flocks,
Lodged in the hollow of two neighbouring hills,
250 The billowy tempest whelms;^o till, upwards urged, buries
The valley to a shining mountain swells,
That curls its wreaths amid the freezing sky.

Now, all amid the rigours of the year,
In the wild depth of Winter, while without 255 The ceaseless winds blow keen, be my retreat
A rural, sheltered, solitary scene;
Where ruddy fire and beaming tapers^o join candles
To chase the cheerless gloom: there let me sit,
And hold high converse with the mighty dead,
260 Sages of ancient time, as gods revered,
As gods beneficent, who blest mankind
With arts, and arms, and humanized a world,
Roused at th' inspiring thought—I throw aside

¹ winnowing Exposed to the wind so that the chaff is separated from the heavier grain.

265 The long-lived volume,¹ and, deep-musing, hail
 The sacred shades, that, slowly-rising, pass
 Before my wondering eyes—First, Socrates,²
 Truth's early champion, martyr for his God:
 Solon,³ the next, who built his commonweal,^o commonwealth
 On equity's firm base: Lycurgus,⁴ then,
 270 Severely good, and him of rugged Rome,
 Numa,⁵ who softened her^o rapacious^o sons. Rome's / greedy
 Cimon⁶ sweet-souled, and Aristides⁷ just.
 Unconquered Cato,⁸ virtuous in extreme;
 With that attemper'd^o hero,⁹ mild, and firm, well-balanced
 275 Who wept the brother, while the tyrant bled.

¹ long-lived volume Reference to Parallel Lives, a collection of paired biographies of prominent Greeks and Romans by Plutarch, Greek biographer (c. 46–120 CE).

² Socrates Greek philosopher (469–399 BCE) who considered the knowledge of one's self as the highest good; he was forced to drink poisonous hemlock after being convicted of corrupting Athens' youth and perpetuating religious heresies.

³ Solon Athenian statesman (c. 639–c. 559 BCE) whose humane legal reforms contributed to the end of serfdom in Attica and established the democratic basis of the Athenian state.

⁴ Lycurgus Although it is unclear whether he actually existed, Lycurgus is traditionally held to be the founder of the Spartan constitution.

⁵ Numa Numa Pompilius (7th century BCE), second king of Rome after Romulus, believed to be responsible for the Roman ceremonial laws and religious rites that encouraged peace in the city.

⁶ Cimon Athenian general and statesman (c. 510–449 BCE), remembered for both his military success against the Persians and his powerful influence in government.

⁷ Aristides Athenian general and statesman (d. c. 468 BCE), known as Aristides the Just, who contributed significantly to Cimon's military success against the Persians.

⁸ Cato Marcus Porcius Cato (95–46 BCE), Roman statesman known for his incorruptibility and honesty, who opposed Julius Caesar and was subsequently exiled; Cato marched six days across the African desert to join his allies in Utica after which he realized the futility of his campaign; he chose suicide rather than surrender to Caesar.

⁹ attemper'd hero Timoleon, Greek statesman and military leader (d. c. 337 BCE) who successfully fought against the tyrants of Syracuse, where he subsequently set up a democratic government; when Timoleon's brother, Timophanes, attempted to declare himself the absolute ruler of their city, Corinth, Timoleon assisted in his brother's assassination, weeping all the while.

Scipio,¹⁰ the humane warrior, gently brave,
 Fair learning's friend, who early sought the shade,
 To dwell, with innocence and truth, retired.
 And, equal to the best, the Theban,¹¹ he 280 Who, single, raised his country into fame.
 Thousands behind, the boast of Greece and Rome,
 Whom virtue owns, the tribute of a verse
 Demand, but who can count the stars of heaven?
 Who sing their influence on this lower world?
 285 But see who yonder comes! nor comes alone,
 With sober state, and of majestic mien,^o bearing
 The Sister-Muses in his train—'tis he!
 Maro!¹² the best of poets, and of men!
 Great Homer¹³ too appears, of daring wing!
 290 Parent of song! and, equal, by this side,
 The British Muse,¹⁴ joined hand in hand, they walk,
 Darkling,^o nor miss their way to fame's ascent. in the dark

Society divine! Immortal minds!
 Still visit thus my nights, for you reserved,
 295 And mount my soaring soul to deeds like yours.
 Silence! thou lonely power! the door be thine:
 See, on the hallowed hour, that none intrude,
 Save Lycidas,¹⁵ the friend with sense refined,
 Learning digested well, exalted faith,
 300 Unstudied wit, and humour ever gay.

¹⁰ Scipio Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus (236–183 BCE), Roman general who conquered Spain and Carthage and defeated Hannibal in the Punic Wars.

¹¹ the Theban Possibly Pelopidas (d. 364 BCE), Theban general who rescued Thebes from Sparta in 379 BCE, or Epaminondas (c. 420–362 BCE), famous Greek military tactician under whom Pelopidas served.

¹² Maro Publius Virgilius Maro, or Virgil, Roman poet (70–19 BCE), author of The Aeneid, an epic detailing the life of Aeneas, mythical father of the Roman people, who embodied the Roman virtues, and The Georgics, poems recounting the joy of rural and farming life.

¹³ Homer Greek poet (c. 700 BCE), putative author of The Iliad, an account of the Greeks' war with the Trojans, and The Odyssey, which tells the story of Odysseus's journey home after the war's end; Homer was believed to have been blind.

¹⁴ British Muse John Milton (1608–74), English poet famous for such works as Paradise Lost, Comus, and Paradise Regained.

¹⁵ Lycidas In his pastoral elegy Lycidas (1638), Milton laments the drowning death of his school fellow, Edward King; Thomson may be referring to his friend David Mallet, with whom he wrote the masque Alfred (1740).

Clear frost succeeds, and through the blue serene,
 For sight too fine, the ethereal nitre¹ flies,
 To bake the glebe,^o and bind the slippery flood. soil
 This of the wintry season is the prime;
 Pure are the days, and lustrous are the nights,
 Brightened with starry worlds, till then unseen.
 Meanwhile, the Orient, darkly red, breathes forth
 An icy gale, that, in its mid career,
 Arrests the bickering^o stream. The nightly sky noisy
 And all her glowing constellations pour
 Their rigid influence down: it freezes on Till Morn, late-rising, o'er the drooping world
 Lifts her pale eye, unjoyous: then appears
 The various labour of the silent night,
 The pendant icicle, the frost-work fair,
 Where thousand figures rise, the crusted snow,
 Though white, made whiter, by the fining^o north. refining
 On blithesome^o frolics bent, the youthful swains, sprightly
 While every work of man is laid at rest,
 Rush o'er the wat'ry plains, and, shuddering, view
 The fearful deeps below: or with the gun,
 And faithful spaniel, range the ravaged fields,
 And, adding to the ruins of the year,
 Distress the feathery, or the footed game.

But hark! the nightly winds, with hollow voice,
 Blow, blustering, from the south—the frost subdued,
 Gradual, resolves into a weeping thaw.
 Spotted, the mountains shine: loose sleet descends,
 And floods the country round: the rivers swell,
 Impatient for the day. Those sullen seas,
 That wash th' ungenial^o pole, will rest no more inhospitable
 Beneath the shackles of the mighty north;
 But, rousing all their waves, resistless heave,
 And hark! the length'ning roar, continuous, runs
 Athwart^o the rifted main; at once it bursts, side to side
 And piles a thousand mountains to the clouds!
 Ill fares the bark,^o the wretches' last resort, boat
 That, lost amid the floating fragments, moors
 Beneath the shelter of an icy isle;
 While night o'erwhelms the sea, and horror looks
 More horrible. Can human hearts endure
 Th' assembled mischiefs that besiege them round:

¹ ethereal nitre Substance believed to exist in air or plants and to cause various phenomena.

Unlist'ning hunger, fainting weariness,
 The roar of winds, and waves, the crush of ice,
 Now ceasing, now renewed with louder rage,
 And bellowing round the main: nations remote,
 Shook from their midnight-slumbers, deem they hear
 Portentous thunder in the troubled sky.
 More to embroil the deep, Leviathan²
 350 And his unwieldy train, in horrid sport,
 Tempest the loosened brine; while, through the gloom,
 Far from the dire, inhospitable shore,
 The lion's rage, the wolf's sad howl is heard,
 And all the fell^o society of night. cruel
 355 Yet Providence, that ever-waking eye,
 Looks down, with pity, on the fruitless toil
 Of mortals, lost to hope, and lights^o them causes to arrive safe
 Through all this dreary labyrinth of fate.

'Tis done! dread Winter has subdued the year,
 360 And reigns, tremendous, o'er the desert plains!
 How dead the vegetable kingdom lies!
 How dumb the tuneful! Horror wide extends His solitary empire. Now, fond Man!
 Behold thy pictured life: pass some few years,
 365 Thy flow'ring Spring, thy short-lived Summer's strength,
 Thy sober Autumn, fading into age,
 And pale, concluding, Winter shuts thy scene,
 And shrouds thee in the grave—where now, are fled
 Those dreams of greatness? those unsolid hopes 370 Of happiness? those longings after fame?
 Those restless cares? those busy, bustling days?
 Those nights of secret guilt? those veering thoughts,
 Flutt'ring 'twixt good and ill, that shared thy life?
 All, now, are vanished! Virtue, sole, survives,
 375 Immortal, mankind's never-failing friend,
 His guide to happiness on high—and see!
 'Tis come, the glorious morn! the second birth
 Of Heaven, and Earth! Awakening Nature hears
 Th' Almighty trumpet's voice, and starts to life, 380 Renewed, unfading. Now, th' eternal scheme,
 That dark perplexity, that mystic maze,
 Which sight could never trace, nor heart conceive,
 To reason's eye, refined, clears up apace.^o speedily

² Leviathan Monster of the deep mentioned in Job 41.

Angels and men, astonished, pause—and dread
 385 To travel through the depths of Providence,
 Untried, unbounded. Ye vain learned! see,
 And, prostrate in the dust, adore that power,
 And goodness, oft arraigned.^o See now accused of a fault
 the cause,
 Why conscious worth, oppressed, in secret long
 390 Mourned, unregarded: why the good man's share
 In life was gall, and bitterness of soul:
 Why the lone widow, and her orphans, pined,
 In starving solitude; while luxury,
 In palaces, lay prompting her low thought
 395 To form unreal wants: why heaven-born faith,
 And charity, prime grace! wore the red marks
 Of persecution's scourge:^o why licensed pain, whip
 That cruel spoiler, that embosomed^o foe, embraced Embittered all our bliss. Ye good distressed!
 400 Ye noble few! that, here, unbending, stand
 Beneath life's pressures—yet a little while,
 And all your woes are past. Time swiftly fleets,
 And wished eternity, approaching, brings
 Life undecaying, love without alloy, 405 Pure flowing joy, and happiness sincere.
 —1726

*Rule, Britannia*¹

When Britain first, at Heaven's command,
 Arose from out the azure main;^o sea
 This was the charter of the land,
 And guardian angels sung this strain:
 5 "Rule, Britannia, rule the waves;
 Britons never will be slaves."

The nations not so blessed as thee
 Must, in their turns, to tyrants fall:
 While thou shalt flourish great and free,
 10 The dread and envy of them all.
 "Rule," etc.

Still more majestic shalt thou rise,
 More dreadful, from each foreign stroke:
 As the loud blast that tears the skies
 15 Serves but to root thy native oak.
 "Rule," etc.

Thee haughty tyrants ne'er shall tame:
 All their attempts to bend thee down
 Will but arouse thy generous flame,
 20 But work their woe, and thy renown.
 "Rule," etc.

To thee belongs the rural reign;
 Thy cities shall with commerce shine:
 All thine shall be the subject main,
 25 And every shore it circles thine.
 "Rule," etc.

The Muses, still^o with freedom found, always
 Shall to thy happy coast repair:
 Blessed isle! with matchless beauty crowned,
 30 And manly hearts to guard the fair.
 "Rule, Britannia, rule the waves;
 Britons never will be slaves."

—1740

¹ Rule, Britannia From Thomson's masque Alfred (1740), first performed for the Prince and Princess of Wales. This song became so popular that it has come to be considered the unofficial national anthem of Britain ("Britannia" was the original name given to England and Wales by the Romans).

SAMUEL JOHNSON

1709 – 1784

Samuel Johnson, the legendary eighteenth-century figure, has been referred to as a “great talker,” “great moralist,” “great man of letters,” “great Cham of literature,” and even, “a great man who looked like an idiot.” One nineteenth-century British scholar declared that the reputation of Johnson’s genius was such that he had come to embody for the English “all that we admire in ourselves.” Johnson’s rise from poverty and obscurity, his quick wit and forceful personality, his dedication to practical common sense and morality, his insatiable pursuit of knowledge, and his use of that knowledge for the cultural advancement of the English have all played a part in making him one of the most celebrated literary figures in British history.

The first three decades of Johnson’s life gave little indication that he would one day claim such greatness. He was a premature, unhealthy infant who was not expected to survive childhood. He contracted scrofula soon after birth, the result of which was deep facial scarring, deafness in one ear, and blindness in one eye. As he grew older he suffered from a variety of nervous tics that caused him to twitch and mutter a good deal; until he began speaking, which he did with extraordinary eloquence, people often assumed him to be suffering from some mental disability. He was also prone to depression and was plagued by a series of anxieties, the most pervasive of which was an overwhelming fear of madness. This was strongest, according to James Boswell, “at the very time when he was giving proofs of a more than ordinary soundness of judgment and vigour.”

Johnson excelled in school, however, and supplemented his education with voracious reading at home. His father was a bookseller, and Johnson chose his books indiscriminately from the available stacks. He arrived at Oxford one of the most qualified students the university had seen; nevertheless, his parents’ meager funds did not allow him to stay through his second year. After a brief teaching post, a failed attempt to start a school, and several years of paralyzing depression, Johnson and his wife Tetty (whom he had married in 1735), moved to London.

In London Johnson joined the hundreds of others who earned their living by anonymous hack writing. As his poem London (1738) attests, “Slow rises worth, by poverty depressed.” Johnson’s career was helped along by his writing for Gentleman’s Magazine, one of the most successful of London’s journals. He also gained valuable employment compiling an annotated catalogue of the library of Edward Harley, Lord Oxford, for its purchaser, Thomas Osborne—a job that helped him to become a scholar who, as Adam Smith later claimed, “knew more books than any man alive.”

In 1749, Johnson, who was becoming known for his extraordinary erudition, was hired by a group of London booksellers to compile the first comprehensive English dictionary. The Dictionary of the English Language (1755)—the first edition of which required nine years and the help of six assistants to complete—set the standard for all future dictionaries in the sheer volume of words it defined (40,000 in total), the various shades of meaning it distinguished, the logic and clarity of those definitions, and the hundreds of thousands of literary quotations (many of which Johnson wrote out from memory) that served as examples. Though Johnson’s whimsical definition of lexicographer reads “a writer of dictionaries, a harmless drudge,” many of the decisions he made in forming his dictionary became central tenets of modern lexicography. In particular, his choice to make the dictionary descriptive (a catalogue of all known words and their various uses) rather than prescriptive (a selective list to instruct in the proper use of the language and eliminate “low” or “vulgar” words) decisively shaped the role that dictionaries would play in the future development of the language.

During these years, “Dictionary Johnson” composed essays as a nightly diversion from the “drudgery” of lexicography. Over 200 of the moral, critical, and intellectual explorations he compiled were published in a periodical he produced twice weekly (frequently dashing off articles at the very last minute, with the printer’s messenger waiting by his side), called The Rambler (1750–52). The practical wisdom and stark clarity of these essays won favor with readers, as did Johnson’s careful study and description of human nature, his ability to apply reason to experience, and his celebrations of moral strength and virtue. He later resumed his essay writing with the lighter and more humorous weekly periodical The Idler (1758–60). Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia (1759) broadened Johnson’s reputation as a moralist. This work of fiction—part novel, part moral parable—tells the story of various characters who leave their idyllic home to embark on a fruitless search for one “choice of life” that will bring them endless happiness. The wit and compassion evident in this tale of the insatiability of the human mind made it Johnson’s most enduringly popular work, and led Boswell to claim that he was not satisfied unless he reread it at least once a year.

In the latter half of the eighteenth century Johnson at last attained professional and financial security. For his dictionary work Oxford awarded him an honorary Master’s degree in 1755 (followed in 1765 by a Doctorate of Law from Trinity College and in 1775 by a Doctorate of Civil Law, also from Oxford), and George III granted him an annual pension of £300. In 1765, after eight years of toil, he completed his edition of Shakespeare, which, with its preface, became an influential contribution to Shakespeare scholarship.

For a time after the death of his wife in 1752, Johnson led a rather solitary existence. Within a few years, however, he had met aspiring writer James Boswell and brewer Henry Thrale and his wife, Hester Thrale (later Piozzi), and had begun to travel for the first time in his life—with the Thrales to France and Wales and with Boswell to Scotland and the Hebrides. By now renowned for his powers of conversation, Johnson eventually found himself at the center of a large circle of leading men (which included painter Sir Joshua Reynolds, politician Edmund Burke, writer Oliver Goldsmith, and actor David Garrick), whose weekly discussions were motivated largely by a desire to hear Johnson talk.

Johnson’s last major project was his Lives of the English Poets (1779–81). Asked by a group of publishers to write brief introductions to a small edition of English poets, Johnson so enjoyed the project that his pieces expanded beyond mere prefaces into comprehensive critical and historical texts. The publishers, recognizing that these 52 biographies and literary commentaries were powerful works of scholarship in their own right, released them as an independent text. The Lives demonstrates Johnson’s belief in “the dignity and usefulness of biography” not merely as a source of historical information about a particular figure, but also as a revealing means of documenting human passions and desires with universal significance. He insisted that his biographies give detailed and truthful accounts of his subjects’ vices as well as their virtues. For Johnson, it was the minute particularities of the subject that held the essence of each life. Johnson’s theories of biography also had an impact on the deeply personal, intimately detailed biographies of him that his friends—most notably Boswell, but also Hester Thrale Piozzi—released after his death.

A few years before his death in 1784 Johnson observed, as he told Boswell, that “there is hardly a day in which there is not something about me in the papers.” Historical research has confirmed the accuracy of this remark—Johnson’s travel plans, various ailments, and movements about town were constantly reported. If there was no news to record, anecdotes were recycled or even invented. The force of Johnson’s personality had captured the attention of the public, and the man who had once professed himself a “retired and uncourtly scholar” had become an integral part of the daily life of a nation. Johnson suffered a stroke in 1783 from which he never fully recovered; he died on 13 December 1784 and was buried in Westminster Abbey a week later.

[Please note that additional work by Johnson appears in the "Early Eighteenth-Century Periodicals" section elsewhere in this volume.]

The Vanity of Human Wishes

THE TENTH SATIRE OF JUVENAL IMITATED¹

Let Observation, with extensive view,
Survey mankind, from China to Peru;
Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
Then say how hope and fear, desire and hate,
O'erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
Where wav'ring man, betrayed by vent'rous pride,
To tread the dreary paths without a guide,
As treach'rous phantoms in the mist delude,
Shuns fancied ills, or chases airy^o good; imaginary
How rarely reason guides the stubborn choice,
Rules the bold hand, or prompts the suppliant voice;
How nations sink, by darling schemes oppressed,
When vengeance listens to the fool's request.
Fate wings with every wish th'afflictive dart,
Each gift of nature, and each grace of art,
With fatal heat impetuous courage glows,
With fatal sweetness elocution flows,
Impeachment stops the speaker's pow'rful breath,
And restless fire precipitates on death.
But scarce observed, the knowing and the bold
Fall in the gen'ral massacre of gold;
Wide-wasting pest! that rages unconfined,
And crowds with crimes the records of mankind;
For gold his sword the hireling ruffian draws,
For gold the hireling judge distorts the laws;
Wealth heaped on wealth, nor truth nor safety buys,
The dangers gather as the treasures rise.
Let hist'ry tell where rival kings command,

The Vanity ... IMITATED In his imitation of Juvenal's satire of human ambition and failure, Johnson replaces the ancient Roman examples with modern ones and adds a background of Christian theology.

And dubious title shakes the madded land,
When statutes glean the refuse of the sword,
How much more safe the vassal than the lord;
Low skulks the hind^o beneath the rage of pow'r, farm-worker
And leaves the wealthy traitor in the Tow'r,²
Untouched his cottage, and his slumbers sound,
Though confiscation's vultures hover round.
The needy traveler, secure and gay,
Walks the wild heath, and sings his toil away.
Does envy seize thee? crush th'upbraiding joy,
Increase his riches and his peace destroy;
Now fears in dire vicissitude invade,
The rustling brake^o alarms, and quiv'ring shade, thicket
Nor light nor darkness bring his pain relief,
One shows the plunder, and one hides the thief.
Yet still one gen'ral cry the skies assails,
And gain and grandeur load the tainted gales;
Few know the toiling statesman's fear or care,
Th' insidious rival and the gaping heir.
Once more, Democritus,³ arise on earth,
With cheerful wisdom and instructive mirth,
See motley⁴ life in modern trappings dressed,
And feed with varied fools th'eternal jest:
Thou who couldst laugh where want enchained caprice,
Toil crushed conceit, and man was of a piece;
Where wealth unloved without a mourner died,
And scarce a sycophant was fed by pride;
Where ne'er was known the form of mock debate,
Or seen a new-made mayor's unwieldy state;

Tow'r The Tower of London, where those accused of treason were imprisoned.

¹ Democritus Philosopher of ancient Greece who is occasionally called "the laughing philosopher" because of his response to the follies of humanity.

⁴ motley Multicolored (a reference to the brightly-colored clothing worn by jesters and fools).

Where change of fav'rites made no change of laws,
 60 And senates heard before they judged a cause;
 How wouldst thou shake at Britain's modish tribe,
 Dart the quick taunt, and edge the piercing gibe?
 Attentive truth and nature to descry,^o perceive
 And pierce each scene with philosophic eye.
 65 To thee were solemn toys or empty show,
 The robes of pleasure and the veils of woe:
 All aid the farce, and all thy mirth maintain,
 Whose joys are causeless, or whose griefs are vain.
 Such was the scorn that filled the sage's mind,
 70 Renewed at ev'ry glance on humankind;
 How just that scorn ere yet thy voice declare,
 Search every state, and canvass^o every prayer. scrutinize
 Unnumbered suppliants crowd Preferment's gate,
 Athirst for wealth, and burning to be great;
 75 Delusive Fortune hears th'incessant call,
 They mount, they shine, evaporate, and fall.
 On every stage the foes of peace attend,
 Hate dogs their flight, and insult mocks their end.
 Love ends with hope, the sinking statesman's door
 80 Pours in the morning worshiper¹ no more;
 For growing names the weekly scribbler lies,
 To growing wealth the dedicator flies,
 From ev'ry room descends the painted face,
 That hung the bright Palladium² of the place,
 85 And smoked in kitchens, or in auctions sold,
 To better features yields the frame of gold;
 For now no more we trace in ev'ry line
 Heroic worth, benevolence divine:
 The form distorted justifies the fall,
 90 And detestation rids th'indignant wall.
 But will not Britain hear the last appeal,
 Sign her foes' doom, or guard her fav'rites' zeal?
 Through Freedom's sons no more remonstrance rings,
 Degrading nobles and controlling kings;
 95 Our supple tribes repress their patriot throats,
 And ask no questions but the price of votes;
 With weekly libels and septennial ale,³

Their wish is full to riot and to rail.
 In full-blown dignity, see Wolsey⁴ stand,
 100 Law in his voice, and fortune in his hand:
 To him the church, the realm, their pow'rs consign,
 Through him the rays of regal bounty shine,
 Turned by his nod the stream of honor flows,
 His smile alone security bestows:
 105 Still to new heights his restless wishes tow'r,
 Claim leads to claim, and pow'r advances pow'r;
 Till conquest unresisted ceased to please,
 And rights submitted, left him none to seize.
 At length his sov'reign frowns—the train of state
 110 Mark the keen glance, and watch the sign to hate.
 Where'er he turns he meets a stranger's eye,
 His suppliants scorn him, and his followers fly;
 At once is lost the pride of awful state,
 The golden canopy, the glitt'ring plate,
 115 The regal palace, the luxurious board,
 The liv'ried army, and the menial lord.
 With age, with cares, with maladies oppressed,
 He seeks the refuge of monastic rest.
 Grief aids disease, remembered folly stings,
 120 And his last sighs reproach the faith of kings.
 Speak thou, whose thoughts at humble peace repine,
 Shall Wolsey's wealth, with Wolsey's end be thine?
 Or liv'st thou now, with safer pride content,
 The wisest justice on the banks of Trent?⁵
 125 For why did Wolsey near the steeps^o of fate, precipices
 On weak foundations raise th'enormous weight?
 Why but to sink beneath misfortune's blow,
 With louder ruin to the gulfs below?
 What gave great Villiers to th'assassin's knife,
 130 And fixed disease on Harley's⁶ closing life?
 What murdered Wentworth, and what exiled Hyde,⁷

Wolsey Lord Chancellor to Henry VIII until imprisoned for failing to obtain the King's divorce from Catherine of Aragon.

Trent River that flows northeasterly through the center of England.

^o Villiers George Villiers, first duke of Buckingham and a favorite of King James I. He was stabbed to death by an army officer in 1628; Harley Robert Harley, first earl of Oxford and powerful politician and statesman (1661–1724).

Wentworth First earl of Stafford and advisor to Charles I who was executed in 1641 at the beginning of the civil war; Hyde First earl of Clarendon who was Lord Chancellor to Charles II but was impeached in 1667 and forced to flee to France.

¹ morning worshiper Men of state would receive visitors and supplicants at morning receptions, or levees.

² Palladium Statue of Pallas Athena that was worshiped in Troy and which protected the city.

³ septennial ale Those running for Parliament would give away free ale at the elections (usually held every seven years).

By kings protected, and to kings allied?
 What but their wish indulged in courts to shine,
 And pow'r too great to keep, or to resign?
 When first the college rolls receive his name,
 The young enthusiast quits his ease for fame;
 Through all his veins the fever of renown
 Burns from the strong contagion of the gown;¹
 O'er Bodley's dome² his future labors spread,
 And Bacon's³ mansion trembles o'er his head.
 Are these thy views? proceed, illustrious youth,
 And virtue guard thee to the throne of Truth!
 Yet should thy soul indulge the gen'rous heat,
 Till captive Science yields her last retreat;
 Should Reason guide thee with her brightest ray,
 And pour on misty Doubt resistless day;
 Should no false Kindness lure to loose delight,
 Nor Praise relax, nor Difficulty fright;
 Should tempting Novelty thy cell refrain,^o avoid
 And Sloth effuse her opiate fumes in vain;
 Should Beauty blunt on fops her fatal dart,
 Nor claim the triumph of a lettered heart;
 Should no disease thy torpid veins invade,
 Nor Melancholy's phantoms haunt thy shade;^o spirit
 Yet hope not life from grief or danger free,
 Nor think the doom of man reversed for thee:
 Deign on the passing world to turn thine eyes,
 And pause awhile from letters, to be wise;
 There mark what ills the scholar's life assail,
 Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.
 See nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
 To buried merit raise the tardy bust.
 If dreams yet flatter, once again attend,
 Hear Lydiat's life, and Galileo's end.⁴
 Nor deem, when learning her last prize bestows,
 The glitt'ring eminence exempt from foes;

See when the vulgar 'scape, despised or awed,
 Rebellion's vengeful talons seize on Laud.⁵
 From meaner minds, though smaller fines content,
 170 The plundered palace or sequestered rent;
 Marked out by dangerous parts^o he meets the shock, talents
 And fatal Learning leads him to the block:
 Around his tomb let Art and Genius weep,
 But hear his death, ye blockheads, hear and sleep.
 175 The festal blazes, the triumphal show,
 The ravished standard, and the captive foe,
 The senate's thanks, the gazette's pompous tale,
 With force resistless o'er the brave prevail.
 Such bribes the rapid Greek⁶ o'er Asia whirled, 180 For such the steady Romans shook the world;
 For such in distant lands the Britons shine,
 And stain with blood the Danube or the Rhine;
 This pow'r has praise, that virtue scarce can warm,
 Till fame supplies the universal charm.
 185 Yet Reason frowns on War's unequal game,
 Where wasted nations raise a single name,
 And mortgaged states their grandsires' wreaths⁷ regret,
 From age to age in everlasting debt;
 Wreaths which at last the dear-bought right convey 190 To rust on medals, or on stones decay.
 On what foundation stands the warrior's pride,
 How just his hopes let Swedish Charles⁸ decide;
 A frame of adamant, a soul of fire,
 No dangers fright him, and no labors tire;
 195 O'er love, o'er fear, extends his wide domain,
 Unconquered lord of pleasure and of pain;
 No joys to him pacific scepters yield,
 War sounds the trump, he rushes to the field;
 Behold surrounding kings their pow'r combine,
 200 And one capitulate, and one resign;⁹
 Peace courts his hand, but spreads her charms in vain;

¹ gown Scholarly robe.

² Bodley's dome Bodleian Library at Oxford University.

³ [Johnson's note] There is a tradition that the study of Friar Bacon, built on an arch over the bridge, will fall when a man greater than Bacon shall pass under it. [Roger Bacon was a noted medieval philosopher, and the bridge referred to is Folly Bridge, at Oxford, which was demolished in 1779.]

⁴ Lydiat's life The mathematician Lydiat lived a life of poverty and was imprisoned for debt; Galileo's end Galileo died condemned of heresy as a result of his philosophical claims.

⁵ Laud William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury during the reign of Charles I, executed for treason in 1645.

⁶ the rapid Greek Alexander the Great.

⁷ wreaths I.e., victory.

⁸ Swedish Charles Charles XII of Sweden (1682–1718), a power-hungry king who, when he was defeated by the Russians, attempted to form an alliance with the Turks. Upon his return to Sweden he invaded Norway and was killed in battle.

⁹ And one ... resign Frederick IV of Denmark yielded to Charles, and Augustus II of Poland was deposed.

“Think nothing gained,” he cries, “till nought remain,
 On Moscow’s walls till Gothic¹ standards fly,
 And all be mine beneath the polar sky.”
 205 The march begins in military state,
 And nations on his eye suspended wait;
 Stern Famine guards the solitary coast,
 And Winter barricades the realms of Frost;
 He comes, not want and cold his course delay—
 210 Hide, blushing Glory, hide Pultowa’s² day:
 The vanquished hero leaves his broken bands,
 And shows his miseries in distant lands;
 Condemned a needy suppliant to wait,
 While ladies interpose, and slaves debate.
 215 But did not Chance at length her error mend?
 Did no subverted empire mark his end?
 Did rival monarchs give the fatal wound?
 Or hostile millions press him to the ground?
 His fall was destined to a barren strand,
 220 A petty fortress, and a dubious hand;³
 He left the name, at which the world grew pale,
 To point a moral, or adorn a tale.
 All times their scenes of pompous woes afford,
 From Persia’s tyrant to Bavaria’s lord.⁴
 225 In gay hostility, and barb’rous pride,
 With half mankind embattled at his side,
 Great Xerxes comes to seize the certain prey,
 And starves exhausted regions in his way;
 Attendant Flattery counts his myriads o’er,
 230 Till counted myriads soothe his pride no more;
 Fresh praise is tried till madness fires his mind,
 The waves he lashes, and enchains the wind;
 New pow’rs are claimed, new pow’rs are still bestowed,
 Till rude resistance lops the spreading god;
 235 The daring Greeks deride the martial show,
 And heap their valleys with the gaudy foe;

Gothic Here, Swedish.

¹ Pultowa Location of Peter the Great’s defeat of Charles in 1709.

² dubious hand It was believed that Charles was shot in battle by one of his own men.

Persia’s tyrant... Bavaria’s lord References to Xerxes and Charles Albert. Xerxes was the Persian king who invaded Greece using a bridge of ships to cross the Hellespont. After a storm broke up the bridge, he ordered his men to whip the wind and waves with chains. Charles Albert, Elector of Bavaria, was defeated by Maria Theresa of Austria in the War of the Austrian Succession (1740–48).

Th’insulted sea with humbler thoughts he gains,
 A single skiff to speed his flight remains;
 Th’encumbered oar scarce leaves the dreaded coast
 240 Through purple billows and a floating host.
 The bold Bavarian, in a luckless hour,
 Tries the dread summits of Cesarean power,
 With unexpected legions bursts away,
 And sees defenseless realms receive his sway;
 245 Short sway! fair Austria spreads her mournful charms,
 The queen, the beauty, sets the world in arms;
 From hill to hill the beacon’s rousing blaze
 Spreads wide the hope of plunder and of praise;
 The fierce Croatian, and the wild Hussar,⁵
 250 And all the sons of ravage crowd the war;
 The baffled prince in honor’s flattering bloom
 Of hasty greatness finds the fatal doom,
 His foes’ derision, and his subjects’ blame,
 And steals to death from anguish and from shame.
 255 Enlarge my life with multitude of days,
 In health, in sickness, thus the suppliant prays;
 Hides from himself his state, and shuns to know,
 That life protracted is protracted woe.
 Time hovers o’er, impatient to destroy,
 260 And shuts up all the passages of joy:
 In vain their gifts the bounteous seasons pour,
 The fruit autumnal, and the vernal flow’r,
 With listless eyes the dotard views the store,
 He views, and wonders that they please no more;
 265 Now pall the tasteless meats, and joyless wines,
 And Luxury⁶ with sighs her slave resigns. pleasure
 Approach, ye minstrels, try the soothing strain,
 Diffuse the tuneful lenitives^o of pain: palliatives
 No sounds alas would touch th’impervious ear, 270 Though dancing mountains witnessed Orpheus⁶ near;
 Nor lute nor lyre his feeble pow’rs attend,
 Nor sweeter music of a virtuous friend,
 But everlasting dictates crowd his tongue,
 Perversely grave, or positively wrong.
 275 The still returning tale, and ling’ring jest,
 Perplex the fawning niece and pampered guest,
 While growing hopes scarce awe the gathering sneer,

⁵ Hussar Hungarian light cavalry.

⁶ Orpheus Musician of Greek mythology who was able to make mountains move with his music.

But leave to Heav'n the measure and the choice,
 Safe in his power, whose eyes discern afar
 The secret ambush of a specious prayer.
 355 Implore his aid, in his decisions rest,
 Secure whate'er he gives, he gives the best.
 Yet when the sense of sacred presence fires,
 And strong devotion to the skies aspires,
 Pour forth thy fervors for a healthful mind,
 360 Obedient passions, and a will resigned;
 For love, which scarce collective° man can fill; as a whole
 For patience sov'reign o'er transmuted ill;
 For faith, that panting for a happier seat,
 Counts death kind Nature's signal of retreat:
 365 These goods for man the laws of Heav'n ordain,
 These goods he grants, who grants the power to gain;
 With these celestial wisdom calms the mind,
 And makes the happiness she does not find.
 —1749

On the Death of Dr. Robert Levett¹

Condemned to Hope's delusive mine,
 As on we toil from day to day,
 By sudden blasts, or slow decline,
 Our social comforts drop away.
 5 Well tried through many a varying year,
 See Levett to the grave descend;
 Officious,° innocent, sincere, kind
 Of every friendless name the friend.
 Yet still he fills affection's eye,
 10 Obscurely° wise, and coarsely kind; quietly
 Nor, lettered° arrogance, deny scholarly
 Thy praise to merit unrefined.
 When fainting nature called for aid,
 And hovering Death prepared the blow,
 15 His vigorous remedy displayed
 The power of art without the show.

¹ Dr. Robert Levett Medical practitioner who worked among London's poor. In later life he resided with Johnson, and died in 1782 at the age of 76.

In misery's darkest caverns known,
 His useful care was ever nigh,
 Where hopeless Anguish poured his groan,
 20 And lonely want retired to die.

No summons mocked by chill delay,
 No petty gain disdained by pride,
 The modest wants of every day
 The toil of every day supplied.

25 His virtues walked their narrow round,
 Nor made a pause, nor left a void;
 And sure th' Eternal Master found
 The single talent well employed.²

The busy day, the peaceful night,
 30 Unfelt, uncounted, glided by;
 His frame was firm, his powers were bright,
 Though now his eightieth year was nigh.

Then with no throbbing fiery pain,
 No cold gradations of decay,
 35 Death broke at once the vital chain,
 And freed his soul the nearest way.
 —1783

The Rambler No. 4

[ON FICTION]

Saturday, 31 March 1750

Simul et jucunda et idonea dicere vitae.

—Horace, Ars Poetica, line 334

And join both profit and delight in one.

—Creech

The works of fiction with which the present generation seems more particularly delighted are such as exhibit life in its true state, diversified only by accidents that daily happen in the world, and influenced by passions and qualities which are really to be found in conversing with mankind.

This kind of writing may be termed not improperly the comedy of romance, and is to be conducted nearly by the rules of comic poetry. Its province is to bring about natural events by easy means, and to keep up curiosity without the help of wonder: it is therefore precluded from the machines¹ and expedients of the heroic romance, and can neither employ giants to snatch away a lady from the nuptial rites, nor knights to bring her back from captivity; it can neither bewilder its personages in deserts, nor lodge them in imaginary castles.

² single . . . employed Cf. the parable of the talents (Matthew 25.14–30).

I remember a remark made by Scaliger upon Pontanus,² that all his writings are filled with the same images; and that if you take from him his lilies and his roses, his satyrs and his dryads, he will have nothing left that can be called poetry. In like manner, almost all the fictions of the last age will vanish if you deprive them of a hermit and a wood, a battle and a shipwreck.

Why this wild strain of imagination found reception so long in polite and learned ages, it is not easy to conceive; but we cannot wonder that, while readers could be procured, the authors were willing to continue it: for when a man had by practice gained some fluency of language, he had no further care than to retire to his closet,³ let loose his invention, and heat his mind with incredibilities; a book was thus produced without fear of criticism, without the toil of study, without knowledge of nature, or acquaintance with life.

The task of our present writers is very different; it requires, together with that learning which is to be gained from books, that experience which can never be attained by solitary diligence, but must arise from general converse and accurate observation of the living world. Their performances have, as Horace expresses it, plus oneris quantum veniae minus, little indulgence, and therefore more difficulty.⁴ They are engaged in portraits of which everyone knows the original, and can detect any deviation from exactness of resemblance. Other writings are safe, except from the malice of learning, but these are in danger from every common reader; as the slipper ill executed was censured by a shoemaker who happened to stop in his way at the Venus of Apelles.⁵ But the fear of not being approved as just copiers of human manners is not the most important concern that an author of this sort ought to have before him. These books are written chiefly to the young, the ignorant, and the idle, to whom they serve as lectures of conduct and introductions into life. They are the entertainment of minds unfurnished with ideas, and therefore easily susceptible of impressions; not fixed by principles, and therefore easily following the current of fancy; not informed by experience, and consequently open to every false suggestion and partial account.

That the highest degree of reverence should be paid to youth, and that nothing indecent should be suffered to approach their eyes or ears, are precepts extorted by sense and virtue from an ancient writer,⁶ by no means eminent for chastity of thought. The same kind, though not the same degree of caution, is required in everything which is laid before them, to secure them from unjust prejudices, perverse opinions, and incongruous combinations of images.

In the romances formerly written, every transaction and sentiment was so remote from all that passes among men that the reader was in very little danger of making any applications to himself; the virtues and crimes were equally beyond his sphere of activity; and he amused himself with heroes and with traitors, deliverers and persecutors, as with beings of another species, whose actions were regulated upon motives of their own, and who had neither faults nor excellencies in common with himself.

But when an adventurer is leveled with the rest of the world, and acts in such scenes of the universal drama, as may be the lot of any other man, young spectators fix their eyes upon him with closer attention, and hope by observing his behavior and success to regulate their own practices, when they shall be engaged in the like part.

For this reason these familiar histories may perhaps be made of greater use than the solemnities of professed machines Unnatural agents or devices that advance the plot.

Scaliger upon Pontanus In his Poetics (1561), influential Renaissance humanist Julius Caesar Scaliger criticizes the Latin poetry of Italian poet Giovanni Pontano (1426–1503).

closet Private study.

Horace ... difficulty From Epistles 2.1.170.

⁵ slipper ... Apelles The fourth-century Greek painter Apelles was praised for the verisimilitude of his works. This story of a shoemaker finding fault with Venus's slipper (prompting Apelles to correct the painting) comes from the Natural History of Pliny the Elder.

⁶ an ancient writer Roman satirist Juvenal, in his Satires, 14.1–58.

morality, and convey the knowledge of vice and virtue with more efficacy than axioms and definitions. But if the power of example is so great as to take possession of the memory by a kind of violence, and produce effects almost without the intervention of the will, care ought to be taken that, when the choice is unrestrained, the best examples only should be exhibited; and that which is likely to operate so strongly should not be mischievous or uncertain in its effects.

The chief advantage which these fictions have over real life is that their authors are at liberty, though not to invent, yet to select objects, and to cull from the mass of mankind those individuals upon which the attention ought most to be employed; as a diamond, though it cannot be made, may be polished by art, and placed in such a situation as to display that lustre which before was buried among common stones.

It is justly considered as the greatest excellency of art to imitate nature; but it is necessary to distinguish those parts of nature which are most proper for imitation: greater care is still required in representing life, which is so often discolored by passion, or deformed by wickedness. If the world be promiscuously¹ described, I cannot see of what use it can be to read the account; or why it may not be as safe to turn the eye immediately upon mankind, as upon a mirror which shows all that presents itself without discrimination.

It is therefore not a sufficient vindication of a character that it is drawn as it appears, for many characters ought never to be drawn; nor of a narrative, that the train of events is agreeable to observation and experience, for that observation which is called knowledge of the world will be found much more frequently to make men cunning than good. The purpose of these writings is surely not only to show mankind, but to provide that they may be seen hereafter with less hazard; to teach the means of avoiding the snares which are laid by Treachery for Innocence, without infusing any wish for that superiority with which the betrayer flatters his vanity; to give the power of counteracting fraud, without the temptation to practice it; to initiate youth by mock encounters in the art of necessary defense, and to increase prudence without impairing virtue.

Many writers, for the sake of following nature, so mingle good and bad qualities in their principal personages, that they are both equally conspicuous; and as we accompany them through their adventures with delight, and are led by degrees to interest ourselves in their favor, we lose the abhorrence of their faults, because they do not hinder our pleasure, or, perhaps, regard them with some kindness for being united with so much merit.

There have been men indeed splendidly wicked, whose endowments threw a brightness on their crimes, and whom scarce any villainy made perfectly detestable, because they never could be wholly divested of their excellencies; but such have been in all ages the great corrupters of the world, and their resemblance ought no more to be preserved, than the art of murdering without pain.

Some have advanced, without due attention to the consequences of this notion, that certain virtues have their correspondent faults, and therefore that to exhibit either apart is to deviate from probability. Thus men are observed by Swift to be "grateful in the same degree as they are resentful."² This principle, with others of the same kind, supposes man to act from a brute impulse, and pursue a certain degree of inclination, without any choice of the object; for otherwise, though it should be allowed that gratitude and resentment arise from the same constitution of the passions, it follows not that they will be equally indulged when reason is consulted; yet unless that consequence be admitted, this sagacious maxim becomes an empty sound, without any relation to practice or to life.

Nor is it evident that even the first motions³ to these effects are always in the same proportion. For pride, which produces quickness of resentment, will obstruct gratitude by unwillingness to admit that inferiority which obligation implies; and it is very unlikely that he who cannot think he receives a favor will acknowledge or repay it.

It is of the utmost importance to mankind that positions of this tendency should be laid open and confuted; for while men consider good and evil as springing from the same root, they will spare the one for the sake of the other and, in judging, if not of others at least of themselves, will be apt to estimate their virtues by their vices. To this fatal error all those will contribute who confound the colors of right and wrong, and, instead of helping to settle their boundaries, mix them with so much art that no common mind is able to dis-unite them.

Swift ... resentful This comment was made by Pope in the Miscellanies he wrote with Swift.

motions Impulses.

¹ promiscuously Indiscriminately.

In narratives where historical veracity has no place, I cannot discover why there should not be exhibited the most perfect idea of virtue; of virtue not angelical, nor above probability, for what we cannot credit we shall never imitate, but the highest and purest that humanity can reach, which, exercised in such trials as the various revolutions of things shall bring upon it, may, by conquering some calamities, and enduring others, teach us what we may hope, and what we can perform. Vice, for vice is necessary to be shown, should always disgust; nor should the graces of gaiety, or the dignity of courage, be so united with it as to reconcile it to the mind. Wherever it appears, it should raise hatred by the malignity of its practices, and contempt by the meanness of its stratagems; for while it is supported by either parts or spirit, it will be seldom heartily abhorred. The Roman tyrant¹ was content to be hated, if he was but feared; and there are thousands of the readers of romances willing to be thought wicked, if they may be allowed to be wits. It is therefore to be steadily inculcated that virtue is the highest proof of understanding, and the only solid basis of greatness; and that vice is the natural consequence of narrow thoughts, that it begins in mistake, and ends in ignominy.

The Rambler No. 60

[ON BIOGRAPHY]

Saturday, 13 October 1750

Quid sit pulchrum, quid turpe, quid utile, quid non, Plenius et melius Chrysippo et Crantore dicit.

—Horace, Epistles, 1.2.3–4

Whose works the beautiful and base contain;
Of vice and virtue more instructive rules,
Than all the sober sages of the schools.

—Francis

¹ The Roman tyrant Caligula (12–43 CE), as reported by the Roman historian Suetonius in his Lives of the Caesars.

All joy or sorrow for the happiness or calamities of others is produced by an act of the imagination that realizes the event however fictitious, or approximates it² however remote, by placing us, for a time, in the condition of him whose fortune we contemplate; so that we feel, while the deception lasts, whatever motions would be excited by the same good or evil happening to ourselves.

Our passions are therefore more strongly moved, in proportion as we can more readily adopt the pains or pleasures proposed to our minds, by recognizing them as once our own, or considering them as naturally incident to our state of life. It is not easy for the most artful writer to give us an interest in happiness or misery which we think ourselves never likely to feel, and with which we have never yet been made acquainted. Histories of the downfall of kingdoms and revolutions of empires are read with great tranquillity; the imperial tragedy pleases common auditors only by its pomp of ornament and grandeur of ideas; and the man whose faculties have been engrossed by business, and whose heart never fluttered but at the rise or fall of stocks, wonders how the attention can be seized, or the affections agitated, by a tale of love.

Those parallel circumstances and kindred images to which we readily conform our minds are, above all other writings, to be found in narratives of the lives of particular persons; and therefore no species of writing seems more worthy of cultivation than biography, since none can be more delightful or more useful, none can more certainly enchain the heart by irresistible interest, or more widely diffuse instruction to every diversity of condition.

The general and rapid narratives of history, which involve a thousand fortunes in the business of a day and complicate innumerable incidents in one great transaction, afford few lessons applicable to private life, which derives its comforts and its wretchedness from the right or wrong management of things which nothing but their frequency makes considerable, Parva, si non fiant quotidie,³ says Pliny, and which can have no place in those relations¹ which never descend below the consultation of senates, the motions of armies, and the schemes of conspirators.

² approximates it Brings it near.

³ Parva ... quotidie Latin: "Small matters, if they did not occur every day" (Pliny the Younger, Epistles 3.1).

I have often thought that there has rarely passed a life of which a judicious and faithful narrative would not be useful. For, not only every man has, in the mighty mass of the world, great numbers in the same condition with himself, to whom his mistakes and miscarriages, escapes and expedients, would be of immediate and apparent use; but there is such an uniformity in the state of man, considered apart from adventitious and separable decorations and disguises, that there is scarce any possibility of good or ill, but is common to humankind. A great part of the time of those who are placed at the greatest distance by fortune, or by temper, must unavoidably pass in the same manner; and though, when the claims of nature are satisfied, caprice, and vanity, and accident begin to produce discriminations and peculiarities, yet the eye is not very heedful or quick which cannot discover the same causes still terminating their influence in the same effects, though sometimes accelerated, sometimes retarded, or perplexed by multiplied combinations. We are all prompted by the same motives, all deceived by the same fallacies, all animated by hope, obstructed by danger, entangled by desire, and seduced by pleasure.

It is frequently objected to relations of particular lives that they are not distinguished by any striking or wonderful vicissitudes. The scholar who passed his life among his books, the merchant who conducted only his own affairs, the priest whose sphere of action was not extended beyond that of his duty, are considered as no proper objects of public regard, however they might have excelled in their several stations, whatever might have been their learning, integrity, and piety. But this notion arises from false measures of excellence and dignity and must be eradicated by considering that, in the esteem of uncorrupted reason, what is of most use is of most value.

It is, indeed, not improper to take honest advantages of prejudice, and to gain attention by a celebrated name; but the business of the biographer is often to pass slightly over those performances and incidents which produce vulgar greatness, to lead the thoughts into domestic privacies and display the minute details of daily life, where exterior appendages are cast aside and men excel each other only by prudence and by virtue. The account of Thuanus² is, with great propriety, said by its author to have been written that it might lay open to posterity the private and familiar character of that man, cuius ingenium et candorem ex ipsius scriptis sunt olim semper miraturi,³ whose candor and genius will to the end of time be by his writings preserved in admiration.

There are many invisible circumstances which, whether we read as inquirers after natural or moral knowledge, whether we intend to enlarge our science⁴ or increase our virtue, are more important than public occurrences. Thus Sallust,⁵ the great master of nature, has not forgot, in his account of Catiline, to remark that “his walk was now quick, and again slow,” as an indication of a mind revolving something with violent commotion. Thus the story of Melancthon⁶ affords a striking lecture on the value of time by informing us that when he made an appointment, he expected not only the hour, but the minute to be fixed, that the day might not run out in the idleness of suspense; and all the plans and enterprises of De Witt⁷ are now of less importance to the world than that part of his personal character which represents him as “careful of his health, and negligent of his life.”

But biography has often been allotted to writers who seem very little acquainted with the nature of their task, or very negligent about the performance. They rarely afford any other account than might be collected from public papers, but imagine themselves writing a life when they exhibit a chronological series of actions or cuius ... miraturi Johnson translates the Latin in the words that follow.

The account of Thuanus Nicolas Rigout's commentary on French historian Jacques-Auguste de Thou's History of His Own Time (1604–20).

¹ science Knowledge.

Sallust First-century BCE Roman historian who wrote a history of Roman politician Catiline's conspiracy against the Republic.

⁶ Melancthon Protestant theologian (1497–1560), a biography of whom was written by Joachim Camerarius.

De Witt Famous Dutch statesman (1625–72). The quotation following is from Sir William Temple's “Essay upon the Cure of the Gout” (1680).

preferments; and so little regard the manners or behavior of their heroes that more knowledge may be gained of a man's real character by a short conversation with one of his servants than from a formal and studied narrative, begun with his pedigree and ended with his funeral.

If now and then they condescend to inform the world of particular facts, they are not always so happy as to select the most important. I know not well what advantage posterity can receive from the only circumstance by which Tickell¹ has distinguished Addison from the rest of mankind, the irregularity of his pulse: nor can I think myself overpaid for the time spent in reading the life of Malherb,² by being enabled to relate, after the learned biographer, that Malherb had two predominant opinions: one, that the looseness of a single woman might destroy all her boast of ancient descent; the other, that the French beggars made use very improperly and barbarously of the phrase "noble gentleman," because either word included the sense of both.

There are, indeed, some natural reasons why these narratives are often written by such as were not likely to give much instruction or delight, and why most accounts of particular persons are barren and useless. If a life be delayed till interest and envy are at an end, we may hope for impartiality, but must expect little intelligence; for the incidents which give excellence to biography are of a volatile and evanescent kind, such as soon escape the memory and are rarely transmitted by tradition. We know how few can portray a living acquaintance, except by his most prominent and observable particularities and the grosser features of his mind; and it may be easily imagined how much of this little knowledge may be lost in imparting it, and how soon a succession of copies will lose all resemblance of the original.

If the biographer writes from personal knowledge, and makes haste to gratify the public curiosity, there is danger lest his interest, his fear, his gratitude, or his tenderness overpower his fidelity and tempt him to conceal, if not to invent. There are many who think it an act of piety to hide the faults or failings of their friends, even when they can no longer suffer by their detection; we therefore see whole ranks of characters adorned with uniform panegyric, and not to be known from one another, but by extrinsic and casual circumstances. "Let me remember," says Hale, "when I find myself inclined to pity a criminal, that there is likewise a pity due to the country."³ If we owe regard to the memory of the dead, there is yet more respect to be paid to knowledge, to virtue, and to truth.

The Rambler No. 155

[ON BECOMING ACQUAINTED WITH OUR REAL CHARACTERS]

Tuesday, 10 September 1751

Steriles transmisimus annos,

Haec aevi mihi prima dies, haec limina vitae.

—Statins, Silvae, 4.2.12-13

Our barren years are past;

Be this of life the first, of sloth the last.

—Elphinston

NO weakness of the human mind has more frequently incurred animadversion than the negligence with which men overlook their own faults, however flagrant, and the easiness with which they pardon them, however frequently repeated.

It seems generally believed that, as the eye cannot see itself, the mind has no faculties by which it can contemplate its own state, and that therefore we have not means of becoming acquainted with our real characters; an opinion which, like innumerable other postulates, an enquirer finds himself inclined to admit upon very little evidence because it affords a ready solution of many difficulties. It will explain why the greatest abilities frequently fail to promote the happiness of those who possess them; why those who can distinguish with the utmost nicety the boundaries of vice and virtue suffer them to be confounded in their own conduct; why the active and vigilant resign their affairs implicitly to the management of others; and why the cautious and fearful make hourly approaches towards ruin, without one sigh of solicitude or struggle for escape.

¹ Tickell Thomas Tickell's life of the essayist Joseph Addison was published in 1721.

² Malherb François de Malherbe (1555–1628), French poet whose biography was written by his friend the Marquis de Racan and published in 1651.

³ Let ... country From Life and Death of Sir Matthew Hale (1682), by Gilbert Burnet.

When a position teems thus with commodious consequences, who can without regret confess it to be false? Yet it is certain that declaimers have indulged a disposition to describe the dominion of the passions as extended beyond the limits that nature assigned. Self-love is often rather arrogant than blind; it does not hide our faults from ourselves, but persuades us that they escape the notice of others, and disposes us to resent censures lest we should confess them to be just. We are secretly conscious of defects and vices which we hope to conceal from the public eye, and please ourselves with innumerable impostures by which, in reality, nobody is deceived.

In proof of the dimness of our internal sight, or the general inability of man to determine rightly concerning his own character, it is common to urge the success of the most absurd and incredible flattery, and the resentment always raised by advice, however soft, benevolent, and reasonable. But flattery, if its operation be nearly examined, will be found to owe its acceptance not to our ignorance but knowledge of our failures, and to delight us rather as it consoles our wants than displays our possessions. He that shall solicit the favour of his patron by praising him for qualities which he can find in himself will be defeated by the more daring panegyrist who enriches him with *adscititious*¹ excellence. Just praise is only a debt, but flattery is a present. The acknowledgement of those virtues on which conscience congratulates us is a tribute that we can at any time exact with confidence, but the celebration of those which we only feign, or desire without any vigorous endeavours to attain them, is received as a confession of sovereignty over regions never conquered, as a favourable decision of disputable claims, and is more welcome as it is more gratuitous.

Advice is offensive, not because it lays us open to unexpected regret, or convicts us of any fault which had escaped our notice, but because it shows us that we are known to others as well as to ourselves; and the officious monitor is persecuted with hatred, not because his accusation is false, but because he assumes that superiority which we are not willing to grant him, and has dared to detect what we desired to conceal.

For this reason advice is commonly ineffectual. If those who follow the call of their desires without enquiry whither they are going had deviated ignorantly from the paths of wisdom and were rushing upon dangers unforeseen, they would readily listen to information that recalls them from their errors, and catch the first alarm by which destruction or infamy is denounced. Few that wander in the wrong way mistake it for the right; they only find it more smooth and flowery, and indulge their own choice rather than approve it: therefore few are persuaded to quit it by admonition or reproof, since it impresses no new conviction, nor confers any powers of action or resistance. He that is gravely informed how soon profusion will annihilate his fortune hears with little advantage what he knew before, and catches at the next occasion of expence, because advice has no force to suppress his vanity. He that is told how certainly intemperance will hurry him to the grave runs with his usual speed to a new course of luxury, because his reason is not invigorated, nor his appetite weakened.

The mischief of flattery is not that it persuades any man that he is what he is not, but that it suppresses the influence of honest ambition by raising an opinion that honour may be gained without the toil of merit; and the benefit of advice arises commonly, not from any new light imparted to the mind, but from the discovery which it affords of the public suffrages. He that could withstand conscience is frightened at infamy, and shame prevails when reason was defeated.

As we all know our own faults, and know them commonly with many aggravations which human perspicacity cannot discover, there is, perhaps, no man, however hardened by impudence or dissipated by levity, sheltered by hypocrisy, or blasted by disgrace, who does not intend some time to review his conduct, and to regulate the remainder of his life by the laws of virtue. New temptations indeed attack him, new invitations are offered by pleasure and interest, and the hour of reformation is always delayed; every delay gives vice another opportunity of fortifying itself by habit; and the change of manners, though sincerely intended and rationally planned, is referred to the time when some craving passion shall be fully gratified, or some powerful allurements cease its importunity.

¹*adscititious* In his Dictionary, Johnson defines this as, "taken in to complete something else, though originally extrinsic; supplemental; additional."

Thus procrastination is accumulated on procrastination, and one impediment succeeds another, till age shatters our resolution, or death intercepts the project of amendment. Such is often the end of salutary purposes, after they have long delighted the imagination and appeased that disquiet which every mind feels from known misconduct, when the attention is not diverted by business or by pleasure.

Nothing surely can be more unworthy of a reasonable nature than to continue in a state so opposite to real happiness as that all the peace of solitude and felicity of meditation must arise from resolutions of forsaking it. Yet the world will often afford examples of men who pass months and years in a continual war with their own convictions, and are daily dragged by habit or betrayed by passion into practices which they closed and opened their eyes with purposes to avoid; purposes which, though settled on conviction, the first impulse of momentary desire totally overthrows.

The influence of custom is indeed such that to conquer it will require the utmost efforts of fortitude and virtue, nor can I think any man more worthy of veneration and renown than those who have burst the shackles of habitual vice. This victory, however, has different degrees of glory as of difficulty; it is more heroic as the objects of guilty gratification are more familiar, and the recurrence of solicitation more frequent. He that, from experience of the folly of ambition, resigns his offices, may set himself free at once from temptation to squander his life in courts, because he cannot regain his former station. He who is enslaved by an amorous passion may quit his tyrant in disgust, and absence will without the help of reason overcome by degrees the desire of returning. But those appetites to which every place affords their proper object, and which require no preparatory measures or gradual advances, are more tenaciously adhesive; the wish is so near the enjoyment that compliance often precedes consideration, and before the powers of reason can be summoned, the time for employing them is past.

Indolence is therefore one of the vices from which those whom it once infects are seldom reformed. Every other species of luxury operates upon some appetite that is quickly satiated, and requires some concurrence of art or accident which every place will not supply; but the desire of ease acts equally at all hours, and the longer it is indulged is the more increased. To do nothing is in every man's power; we can never want an opportunity of omitting duties. The lapse to indolence is soft and imperceptible because it is only a mere cessation of activity; but the return to diligence is difficult because it implies a change from rest to motion, from privation to reality.

*Facilis descensus Averni:
Noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis:
Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hoc opus, hic labor est.*

—Aeneid, 6.126–29

The gates of Hell are open night and day;
Smooth the descent, and easy is the way:
But, to return, and view the cheerful skies;
In this, the task and mighty labour lies.

—Dryden

Of this vice, as of all others, every man who indulges it is conscious; we all know our own state, if we could be induced to consider it; and it might perhaps be useful to the conquest of all these ensnarers of the mind if at certain stated days life was reviewed. Many things necessary are omitted because we vainly imagine that they may be always performed, and what cannot be done without pain will for ever be delayed if the time of doing it be left unsettled. No corruption is great but by long negligence, which can scarcely prevail in a mind regularly and frequently awakened by periodical remorse. He that thus breaks his life into parts will find in himself a desire to distinguish every stage of his existence by some improvement, and delight himself with the approach of the day of recollection, as of the time which is to begin a new series of virtue and felicity.

The Idler No. 31

[ON IDLENESS]

Saturday, 18 November 1758

Many moralists have remarked that pride has, of all human vices, the widest dominion, appears in the greatest multiplicity of forms, and lies hid under the greatest variety of disguises; of disguises, which, like the moon's "veil of brightness," are both its "luster and its shade,"¹ and betray it to others, though they hide it from ourselves.

It is not my intention to degrade pride from this pre-eminence of mischief, yet I know not whether idleness may not maintain a very doubtful and obstinate competition.

There are some that profess idleness in its full dignity, who call themselves the Idle, as Busiris in the play "calls himself the Proud";² who boast that they do nothing, and thank their stars that they have nothing to do; who sleep every night till they can sleep no longer, and rise only that exercise may enable them to sleep again; who prolong the reign of darkness by double curtains, and never see the sun but to "tell him how they hate his beams";³ whose whole labor is to vary the postures of indulgence, and whose day differs from their night but as a couch or chair differs from a bed.

These are the true and open votaries of idleness, for whom she weaves the garlands of poppies, and into whose cup she pours the waters of oblivion; who exist in a state of unruffled stupidity,⁴ forgetting and forgotten; who have long ceased to live, and at whose death the survivors can only say that they have ceased to breathe.

But idleness predominates in many lives where it is not suspected, for being a vice which terminates in itself, it may be enjoyed without injury to others, and is therefore not watched like fraud, which endangers property, or like pride, which naturally seeks its gratifications in another's inferiority. Idleness is a silent and peaceful quality that neither raises envy by ostentation, nor hatred by opposition; and therefore nobody is busy to censure or detect it.

As pride sometimes is hid under humility, idleness is often covered by turbulence and hurry. He that neglects his known duty and real employment, naturally endeavors to crowd his mind with something that may bar out the remembrance of his own folly, and does any thing but what he ought to do with eager diligence, that he may keep himself in his own favor.

Some are always in a state of preparation, occupied in previous measures, forming plans, accumulating materials, and providing for the main affair. These are certainly under the secret power of idleness. Nothing is to be expected from the workman whose tools are forever to be sought. I was once told by a great master that no man ever excelled in painting who was eminently curious⁵ about pencils⁶ and colors.

There are others to whom idleness dictates another expedient, by which life may be passed unprofitably away without the tediousness of many vacant hours. The art is to fill the day with petty business, to have always something in hand which may raise curiosity, but not solicitude, and keep the mind in a state of action, but not of labor.

This art has for many years been practiced by my old friend Sober,⁷ with wonderful success. Sober is a man of strong desires and quick imagination, so exactly balanced by the love of ease that they can seldom stimulate him to any difficult undertaking; they have, however, so much power that they will not suffer him to lie quite at rest, and though they do not make him sufficiently useful to others, they make him at least weary of himself.

Mr. Sober's chief pleasure is conversation; there is no end of his talk or his attention; to speak or to hear is equally pleasing; for he still fancies that he is teaching or learning something, and is free for the time from his own reproaches.

¹ veil ... shade From Samuel Butler's Hudibras (1663–78), 2.1.907–08.

² Busiris ... Proud From the play Busiris (1719), 1.1.13, by Edward Young.

³ tell ... beams Satan in Milton's Paradise Lost, 4.37.

⁴ stupidity Stupor.

⁵ curious Fastidious.

⁶ pencils Paintbrushes.

⁷ old friend Sober Many of Johnson's friends believed the description of Sober was meant to be autobiographical.

But there is one time at night when he must go home, that his friends may sleep; and another time in the morning, when all the world agrees to shut out interruption. These are the moments of which poor Sober trembles at the thought. But the misery of these tiresome intervals he has many means of alleviating. He has persuaded himself that the manual arts are undeservedly overlooked; he has observed in many trades the effects of close thought and just ratiocination. From speculation he proceeded to practice, and supplied himself with the tools of a carpenter, with which he mended his coal-box very successfully, and which he still continues to employ, as he finds occasion.

He has attempted at other times the crafts of the shoemaker, tinman, plumber, and potter; in all these arts he has failed, and resolves to qualify himself for them by better information. But his daily amusement is chemistry. He has a small furnace, which he employs in distillation, and which has long been the solace of his life. He draws oils and waters, and essences and spirits, which he knows to be of no use; sits and counts the drops as they come from his retort, and forgets that, while a drop is falling, a moment flies away.

Poor Sober! I have often teased him with reproof, and he has often promised reformation; for no man is so much open to conviction as the idler, but there is none on whom it operates so little. What will be the effect of this paper I know not; perhaps he will read it and laugh, and light the fire in his furnace; but my hope is that he will quit his trifles and betake himself to rational and useful diligence.

The Idler No. 49

[WILL MARVEL]

Saturday, 24 March 1759

I supped three nights ago with my friend Will Marvel. His affairs obliged him lately to take a journey into Devonshire, from which he has just returned. He knows me to be a very patient hearer, and was glad of my company, as it gave him an opportunity of disburthening himself by a minute relation of the casualties of his expedition.

Will is not one of those who go out and return with nothing to tell. He has a story of his travels, which will strike a homebred citizen with horror, and has in ten days suffered so often the extremes of terror and joy that he is in doubt whether he shall ever again expose either his body or mind to such danger and fatigue.

When he left London the morning was bright, and a fair day was promised. But Will is born to struggle with difficulties. That happened to him which has sometimes, perhaps, happened to others. Before he had gone more than ten miles it began to rain. What course was to be taken! His soul disdained to turn back. He did what the king of Prussia might have done, he flapped his hat, buttoned up his cape, and went forwards, fortifying his mind by the stoical consolation that whatever is violent will be short.

His constancy was not long tried; at the distance of about half a mile he saw an inn, which he entered wet and weary, and found civil treatment and proper refreshment. After a respite of about two hours he looked abroad and, seeing the sky clear, called for his horse and passed the first stage without any other memorable accident.

Will considered that labour must be relieved by pleasure, and that the strength which great undertakings require must be maintained by copious nutriment; he therefore ordered himself an elegant supper, drank two bottles of claret, and passed the beginning of the night in sound sleep; but, waking before light, was forewarned of the troubles of the next day by a shower beating against his windows with such violence as to threaten the dissolution of nature. When he arose he found what he expected, that the country was under water. He joined himself, however, to a company that was travelling the same way, and came safely to the place of dinner, though every step of his horse dashed the mud into the air.

In the afternoon, having parted from his company, he set forward alone, and passed many collections of water of which it was impossible to guess the depth, and which he now cannot review without some censure of his own rashness; but what a man undertakes he must perform, and Marvel hates a coward at his heart.

Few that lie warm in their beds think what others undergo who have perhaps been as tenderly educated, and have as acute sensations as themselves. My friend was now to lodge the second night almost fifty miles from home, in a house which he never had seen before, among people to whom he was totally a stranger, not knowing whether the next man he should meet would prove good or bad; but seeing an inn of a good appearance, he rode resolutely into the yard, and knowing that respect is often paid in proportion as it is claimed, delivered his injunction to the hostler with spirit and, entering the house, called vigorously about him.

On the third day up rose the sun and Mr. Marvel. His troubles and his dangers were now such as he wishes no other man ever to encounter. The ways were less frequented, and the country more thinly inhabited. He rode many a lonely hour through mire and water, and met not a single soul for two miles together with whom he could exchange a word. He cannot deny that, looking round upon the dreary region and seeing nothing but bleak fields and naked trees, hills obscured by fogs, and flats covered with inundations, he did for some time suffer melancholy to prevail upon him, and wished himself again safe at home. One comfort he had, which was to consider that none of his friends were in the same distress, for whom, if they had been with him, he should have suffered more than for himself; he could not forbear sometimes to consider how happily the Idler is settled in an easier condition, who, surrounded like him with terrors, could have done nothing but lie down and die.

Amidst these reflections he came to a town and found a dinner, which disposed him to more cheerful sentiments: but the joys of life are short, and its miseries are long; he mounted and travelled fifteen miles more through dirt and desolation.

At last the sun set, and all the horrors of darkness came upon him. He then repented the weak indulgence by which he had gratified himself at noon with too long an interval of rest: yet he went forward along a path which he could no longer see, sometimes rushing suddenly into water, and sometimes encumbered with stiff clay, ignorant whither he was going, and uncertain whether his next step might not be the last.

In this dismal gloom of nocturnal peregrination his horse unexpectedly stood still. Marvel had heard many relations of the instinct of horses, and was in doubt what danger might be at hand. Sometimes he fancied that he was on the bank of a river still and deep, and sometimes that a dead body lay across the track. He sat still awhile to recollect his thoughts; and as he was about to alight and explore the darkness, out stepped a man with a lantern, and opened the turnpike.¹ He hired a guide to the town, arrived in safety, and slept in quiet.

The rest of his journey was nothing but danger. He climbed and descended precipices on which vulgar mortals tremble to look; he passed marshes like the "Serbonian bog, where armies whole have sunk";² he forded rivers where the current roared like the eagle of the Severn;³ or ventured himself on bridges that trembled under him, from which he looked down on foaming whirlpools, or dreadful abysses; he wandered over houseless heaths, amidst all the rage of the elements, with the snow driving in his face and the tempest howling in his ears.

Such are the colours in which Marvel paints his adventures. He has accustomed himself to sounding words and hyperbolical images till he has lost the power of true description. In a road through which the heaviest carriages pass without difficulty, and the post-boy every day and night goes and returns, he meets with hardships like those which are endured in Siberian deserts, and misses nothing of romantic danger but a giant and a dragon. When his dreadful story is told in proper terms, it is only that the way was dirty in winter, and that he experienced the common vicissitudes of rain and sunshine.

The Idler No. 81

[ON NATIVE AMERICANS]

Saturday, 3 November 1759

As the English army was passing towards Quebec⁴ along a soft savanna between a mountain and a

¹ turnpike Bar across the road to stop travelers and collect tolls.

² Serbonian ... sunk From Milton's Paradise Lost.

³ eagle Tidal wave; Severn The longest river in England, flowing through Wales and England into the Bristol channel.

⁴ As ... Quebec The English defeated the French in Quebec in October of 1759.

lake, one of the petty chiefs of the inland regions stood upon a rock surrounded by his clan, and from behind the shelter of the bushes contemplated the art and regularity of European war. It was evening, the tents were pitched, he observed the security with which the troops rested in the night, and the order with which the march was renewed in the morning. He continued to pursue them with his eye till they could be seen no longer, and then stood for some time silent and pensive.

Then turning to his followers,¹ "My children," said he, "I have often heard from men hoary with long life, that there was a time when our ancestors were absolute lords of the woods, the meadows, and the lakes, wherever the eye can reach or the foot can pass. They fished and hunted, feasted and danced, and when they were weary lay down under the first thicket, without danger and without fear. They changed their habitations as the seasons required, convenience prompted, or curiosity allured them, and sometimes gathered the fruits of the mountain, and sometimes sported in canoes along the coast.

"Many years and ages are supposed to have been thus passed in plenty and security; when at last a new race of men entered our country from the great ocean. They enclosed themselves in habitations of stone, which our ancestors could neither enter by violence, nor destroy by fire. They issued from those fastnesses, sometimes covered like the armadillo with shells, from which the lance rebounded on the striker, and sometimes carried by mighty beasts which had never been seen in our vales or forests, of such strength and swiftness that flight and opposition were vain alike. Those invaders ranged over the continent, slaughtering in their rage those that resisted, and those that submitted, in their mirth. Of those that remained, some were buried in caverns and condemned to dig metals for their masters; some were employed in tilling the ground, of which foreign tyrants devour the produce; and when the sword and the mines have destroyed the natives, they supply their place by human beings of another colour, brought from some distant country to perish here under toil and torture.

"Some there are who boast their humanity, and content themselves to seize our *chases*² and fisheries, who drive us from every track of ground where fertility and pleasantness invite them to settle, and make no war upon us except when we intrude upon our own lands.

"Others pretend to have purchased a right of residence and tyranny; but surely the insolence of such bargains is more offensive than the avowed and open dominion of force. What reward can induce the possessor of a country to admit a stranger more powerful than himself? Fraud or terror must operate in such contracts; either they promised protection which they never have afforded, or instruction which they never imparted. We hoped to be secured by their favour from some other evil, or to learn the arts of Europe, by which we might be able to secure ourselves. Their power they have never exerted in our defence, and their arts they have studiously concealed from us. Their treaties are only to deceive, and their traffic only to defraud us. They have a written law among them, of which they boast as derived from Him who made the earth and sea, and by which they profess to believe that man will be made happy when life shall forsake him. Why is not this law communicated to us? It is concealed because it is violated. For how can they preach it to an Indian nation when I am told that one of its first precepts forbids them to do to others what they would not that others should do to them.

"But the time perhaps is now approaching when the pride of usurpation shall be crushed, and the cruelties of invasion shall be revenged. The sons of rapacity have now drawn their swords upon each other and referred their claims to the decision of war; let us look unconcerned upon the slaughter, and remember that the death of every European delivers the country from a tyrant and a robber; for what is the claim of either nation but the claim of the vulture to the leveret,³ of the tiger to the fawn? Let them then continue to dispute their title to regions which they cannot people, to purchase by danger and blood the empty dignity of dominion over mountains which they will never climb, and rivers which they will never pass. Let us endeavour, in the chases Hunting grounds.

Then ... followers The basis for this speech may have been one given by the chief of the Micmac that had been printed in London Magazine the previous year.

leveret Young hare (under a year old).

meantime, to learn their discipline, and to forge their weapons; and when they shall be weakened with mutual slaughter, let us rush down upon them, force their remains to take shelter in their ships, and reign once more in our native country.”

from A Dictionary of the English Language

from THE PREFACE

It is the fate of those who toil at the lower employments of life to be rather driven by the fear of evil than attracted by the prospect of good; to be exposed to censure without hope of praise; to be disgraced by miscarriage, or punished for neglect, where success would have been without applause, and diligence without reward.

Among these unhappy mortals is the writer of dictionaries, whom mankind have considered not as the pupil, but the slave, of science, the pioneer¹ of literature, doomed only to remove rubbish and clear obstructions from the paths through which learning and genius press forward to conquest and glory, without bestowing a smile on the humble drudge that facilitates their progress. Every other author may aspire to praise: the lexicographer can only hope to escape reproach—and even this negative recompense has been yet granted to very few.

I have, notwithstanding this discouragement, attempted a dictionary of the English language, which, while it was employed in the cultivation of every species of literature, has itself been hitherto neglected, suffered to spread, under the direction of chance, into wild exuberance, resigned to the tyranny of time and fashion, and exposed to the corruptions of ignorance and caprices of innovation.

When I took the first survey of my undertaking, I found our speech copious without order, and energetic without rules: wherever I turned my view, there was perplexity to be disentangled and confusion to be regulated; choice was to be made out of boundless variety, without any established principle of selection; adulterations were to be detected, without a settled test of purity; and modes of expression to be rejected or received, without the suffrages of any writers of classical reputation or acknowledged authority.

Having therefore no assistance but from general grammar, I applied myself to the perusal of our writers; and, noting whatever might be of use to ascertain or illustrate any word or phrase, accumulated in time the materials of a dictionary, which, by degrees, I reduced to method, establishing to myself, in the progress of the work, such rules as experience and analogy suggested to me—experience, which practice and observation were continually increasing, and analogy, which, though in some words obscure, was evident in others.

In adjusting the orthography, which has been to this time unsettled and fortuitous, I found it necessary to distinguish those irregularities that are inherent in our tongue, and perhaps coeval with it, from others which the ignorance or negligence of later writers has produced. Every language has its anomalies which, though inconvenient and in themselves once unnecessary, must be tolerated among the imperfections of human things, and which require only to be registered that they may not be increased, and ascertained that they may not be confounded. But every language has likewise its improprieties and absurdities which it is the duty of the lexicographer to correct or proscribe.

... When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who, being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can embalm his language and secure it from corruption and decay, that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, and clear the world at once from folly, vanity, and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders. But their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain: sounds are too volatile and subtle for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy;¹ the style of Amelot's translation of Father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un peu passé;² and no Italian will maintain that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccace, Machiavel, or Caro.³

¹pioneer Soldier who builds roads and fortifications, removes obstructions, and otherwise prepares the way for a traveling army.

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen: conquests and migrations are now very rare. But there are other causes of change which, though slow in their operation and invisible in their progress, are perhaps as much superior to human resistance as the revolutions of the sky or intumescence of the tide. Commerce, however necessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language; they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavour to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not always be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port, but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little, above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in procuring the conveniences of life, either without books or, like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labour of the other. Those who have much leisure to think will always be enlarging the stock of ideas, and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words or combinations of words. When the mind is unchained from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As, by the cultivation of various sciences, a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense: the geometrician will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentric virtue of a wild hero,⁴ and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatic delays.⁵ Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known, terms. The tropes⁶ of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the current sense; pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will at one time or other, by public infatuation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy: new phrases are therefore adopted which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed.

¹ The French ... academy The Académie française, founded in 1635, was commissioned to purify and preserve the French language. The Académie published its dictionary in 1634.

² style ... passé Father Paul Sarpi was the author of the History of the Council of Trent, published in Italian in 1619. In 1739 Father Pierre François Le Courayer produced a new French translation of this work, replacing the 1683 translation by Amelot de la Housaye, which Le Courayer referred to as "a bit outdated."

Boccace Giovanni Boccaccio, the fourteenth-century author of the Decameron; Machiavel Fifteenth-century political philosopher Niccolò Machiavelli; Caro Annibale Caro, a fifteenth-century writer of pastoral romance.

⁴ the geometrician ... hero "Zenith" and "eccentric" were formerly used solely as geometrical or astronomical terms, meaning "the point of the heavens directly above" and "not concentric (with another circle), or "not perfectly circular," respectively.

⁵ physician ... delays "Sanguine" and "phlegmatic" were physicians' terms describing the predominance in the body of blood or phlegm, respectively. These terms were later used to describe the temperaments associated with these two humors: those who are sanguine are said to be hopeful and courageous, while those who are phlegmatic are sluggish and apathetic.

tropes Figures of speech in which words are used in senses other than those that are accepted or standard.

Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language,¹ allows that new words must sometimes be introduced but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete, more than general agreement to forbear it? and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again to the mouths of mankind, when it has once become unfamiliar by disuse, and unpleasing by unfamiliarity?

There is another cause of alteration more prevalent than any other, which yet in the present state of the world cannot be obviated. A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both, and they will always be mixed where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory, and haste or negligence, refinement or affectation, will obtrude borrowed terms and exotic expressions.

[SELECTED ENTRIES]

Asthma. A frequent, difficult, and short respiration, joined with a hissing sound and a cough, especially in the night-time, and when the body is in a prone posture; because then the contents of the lower belly bear so against the diaphragm, as to lessen the capacity of the breast, whereby the lungs have less room to move. Quincy.

Bat. An animal having the body of a mouse and the wings of a bird; not with feathers, but with a sort of skin which is extended. It lays no eggs, but brings forth its young alive, and suckles them. It never grows tame, feeds upon flies, insects, and fatty substances, such as candles, oil, and cheese; and appears only in the summer evenings, when the weather is fine. Calmet.

Booby. (A word of no certain etymology. Henshaw thinks it a corruption of *bull-beef*² ridiculously; Skinner imagines it to be derived from bobo, foolish, Span.

Junius finds bowbard to be an old Scottish word for a coward, a contemptible fellow; from which he naturally deduces booby; but the original of bowbard is not known.) A dull, heavy, stupid fellow; a lubber.

Comedy. A dramatic representation of the lighter faults of mankind.

Epic. Narrative; comprising narrations, not acted, but rehearsed. It is usually supposed to be heroic, or to contain one great action achieved by a hero.

Lexicographer. A writer of dictionaries; a harmless drudge, that busies himself in tracing the original, and detailing the signification of words.

Novel. A small tale, generally of love.

Nowadays. (This word, though common and used by the best writers, is perhaps barbarous.) In the present age.

Oats. A grain, which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people.

To partialize. To make partial. A word, perhaps, peculiar to Shakespeare, and not unworthy of general use.

Such neighbour-nearness to our sacred blood
Should nothing privilege him, nor partialize
Th'unstooping firmness of my upright soul.
Shakespeare.

Pastoral. A poem in which any action or passion is represented by its effects upon a country life; or according to the common practice in which speakers take upon them the character of shepherds; an idyll; a bucolic.

Patriot. One whose ruling passion is the love of his country. It is sometimes used for a factious disturber of the government.

Patron. One who countenances, supports, or protects. Commonly a wretch who supports with insolence, and is paid with flattery.

¹ Swift ... language Jonathan Swift's A Proposal for Correcting, Improving, and Ascertaining the English Tongue (1712); petty Small.

² bull-beef Literally, the flesh of bulls; also a term of abuse.

Precarious. Dependent; uncertain, because depending on the will of another; held by courtesy; changeable or alienable at the pleasure of another. No word is more unskilfully used than this with its derivatives. It is used for uncertain in all its senses; but it only means uncertain, as dependent on others: thus there are authors who mention the precariousness of an account, of the weather, of a die.

Rapport. Relation; reference; proportion. A word introduced by the innovator, Temple,¹ but not copied by others.

Reputeless. Disreputable; disgraceful. A word not inelegant, but out of use.

Opinion, that did help me to the crown,
Had left me in reputeless banishment,
A fellow of no mark nor livelihood.

Shakespeare Henry IV.

Romance. A military fable of the middle ages; a tale of wild adventures in war and love.

Romantic: (1) Resembling the tales of romances; wild.
(2) Improbable; false.
(3) Fanciful; full of wild scenery.

Sonnet. A short poem consisting of fourteen lines, of which the rhymes are adjusted by a particular rule. It is not very suitable to the English language, and has not been used by any man of eminence since Milton.

Sonnetteer. A small poet, in contempt.

Stockjobber. A low wretch who gets money by buying and selling shares in the funds.

Tory. One who adheres to the ancient constitution of the state, and the apostolical hierarchy of the church of England, opposed to a Whig.

Vastidity. Wideness; immensity. A barbarous word.

Perpetual durance,
Through all the world's vastidity. Shakespeare.

Vaulty. Arched; concave. A bad word.
I will kiss thy detestable bones,
And put my eye-balls in thy vaulty brows,
And ring these fingers with thy household worms.
Shakespeare.

Whig. The name of a faction.
—1755

from The Preface to The Works of William Shakespeare

Nothing can please many, and please long, but just representations of general nature. Particular manners can be known to few, and therefore few only can judge how nearly they are copied. The irregular combinations of fanciful invention may delight a while, by that novelty of which the common satiety of life sends us all in quest; but the pleasures of sudden wonder are soon exhausted, and the mind can only repose on the stability of truth.

Shakespeare is, above all writers, at least above all modern writers, the poet of nature, the poet that holds up to his readers a faithful mirror of manners and of life. His characters are not modified by the customs of particular places, unpracticed by the rest of the world; by the peculiarities of studies or professions, which can operate but upon small numbers; or by the accidents of transient fashions or temporary opinions: they are the genuine progeny of common humanity, such as the world will always supply, and observation will always find. His persons act and speak by the influence of those general passions and principles by which all minds are agitated, and the whole system of life is continued in motion. In the writings of other poets a character is too often an individual; in those of Shakespeare it is commonly a species.

It is from this wide extension of design that so much instruction is derived. It is this which fills the plays of Shakespeare with practical axioms and domestic wisdom. It was said of Euripides¹ that every verse was a precept, and it may be said of Shakespeare that from his Works may be collected a system of civil and economical² prudence. Yet his real power is not shown in the splendour of particular passages, but by the progress of his fable,³ and the tenor of his dialogue; and he that tries to recommend him by select quotations will succeed like the pedant in Hierocles,⁴ who, when he offered his house to sale, carried a brick in his pocket as a specimen.

¹ Temple Sir William Temple, seventeenth-century English diplomat and author, perhaps best known for his essay Of Ancient and Modern Learning (1690).

It will not easily be imagined how much Shakespeare excels in accommodating his sentiments to real life, but by comparing him with other authors. It was observed of the ancient schools of declamation that the more diligently they were frequented, the more was the student disqualified for the world, because he found nothing there which he should ever meet in any other place. The same remark may be applied to every stage but that of Shakespeare. The theatre, when it is under any other direction, is peopled by such characters as were never seen conversing in a language which was never heard, upon topics which will never arise in the commerce of mankind. But the dialogue of this author is often so evidently determined by the incident which produces it, and is pursued with so much ease and simplicity, that it seems scarcely to claim the merit of fiction, but to have been gleaned by diligent selection out of common conversation, and common occurrences. Upon every other stage the universal agent is love, by whose power all good and evil is distributed, and every action quickened or retarded. To bring a lover, a lady, and a rival into the fable; to entangle them in contradictory obligations, perplex them with oppositions of interest, and harass them with violence of desires inconsistent with each other; to make them meet in rapture and part in agony; to fill their mouths with hyperbolic joy and outrageous sorrow; to distress them as nothing human ever was distressed; to deliver them as nothing human ever was delivered, is the business of a modern dramatist. For this, probability is violated, life is misrepresented, and language is depraved.⁵ But love is only one of many passions, and as it has no great influence upon the sum of life, it has little operation in the dramas of a poet, who caught his ideas from the living world, and exhibited only what he saw before him. He knew that any other passion, as it was regular or exorbitant, was a cause of happiness or calamity.

Characters thus ample and general were not easily discriminated and preserved, yet perhaps no poet ever kept his personages more distinct from each other. I will not say with Pope⁶ that every speech may be assigned to the proper speaker, because many speeches there are which have nothing characteristic; but perhaps, though some may be equally adapted to every person, it will be difficult to find any that can be properly transferred from the present possessor to another claimant. The choice is right, when there is reason for choice.

Other dramatists can only gain attention by hyperbolic or aggravated characters, by fabulous and unexampled excellence or depravity, as the writers of barbarous romances invigorated the reader by a giant and a dwarf; and he that should form his expectations of human affairs from the play, or from the tale, would be equally deceived. Shakespeare has no heroes; his scenes are occupied only by men, who act and speak as the reader thinks that he should himself have spoken or acted on the same occasion. Even where the agency is supernatural, the dialogue is level with life. Other writers disguise the most natural passions and most frequent incidents; so that he who contemplates them in the book will not know them in the world: Shakespeare approximates⁷ the remote, and familiarizes the wonderful; the event which he represents will not happen, but if it were possible, its effects would probably be such as he has assigned; and it may be said that he has not only shown human nature as it acts in real exigencies, but as it would be found in trials to which it cannot be exposed.

Euripides Greek tragic poet of the fifth century BCE. The opinion is that of Cicero, stated in his Letters to His Friends, 16.8.

¹ economical Johnson defines this in his Dictionary as "pertaining to the regulation of a household."

² fable Defined by Johnson as "the series or contexture of events which constitute a poem epic or dramatic."

Hierocles Alexandrian philosopher of the fifth century CE.

⁵ depraved Debased.

⁶ Pope Alexander Pope, in the preface to his edition of Shakespeare's plays (1725).

approximates Brings near.

This therefore is the praise of Shakespeare, that his drama is the mirror of life; that he who has mazed¹ his imagination in following the phantoms which other writers raise up before him, may here be cured of his delirious ecstasies by reading human sentiment in human language; by scenes from which a hermit may estimate the transactions of the world, and a confessor² predict the progress of the passions.

His adherence to general nature has exposed him to the censure of critics, who form their judgements upon narrower principles. Dennis and Rymer³ think his Romans not sufficiently Roman; and Voltaire⁴ censures his kings as not completely royal. Dennis is offended that Menenius, a senator of Rome, should play the buffoon; and Voltaire perhaps thinks decency violated when the Danish usurper is represented as a drunkard.⁵ But Shakespeare always makes nature predominate over accident; and if he preserves the essential character, is not very careful of distinctions superinduced and adventitious. His story requires Romans or kings, but he thinks only on men. He knew that Rome, like every other city, had men of all dispositions; and, wanting a buffoon, he went into the senate-house for that which the senate-house would certainly have afforded him. He was inclined to show a usurper and a murderer not only odious but despicable; he therefore added drunkenness to his other qualities, knowing that kings love wine like other men, and that wine exerts its natural power upon kings. These are the petty cavils of petty minds; a poet overlooks the casual distinction of country and condition, as a painter, satisfied with the figure, neglects the drapery.

The censure which he has incurred by mixing comic and tragic scenes, as it extends to all his works, deserves more consideration. Let the fact be first stated, and then examined.

Shakespeare's plays are not in the rigorous and critical sense either tragedies or comedies, but compositions of a distinct kind; exhibiting the real state of sublunary nature, which partakes of good and evil, joy and sorrow, mingled with endless variety of proportion and innumerable modes of combination; and expressing the course of the world, in which the loss of one is the gain of another; in which, at the same time, the reveller is hasting to his wine, and the mourner burying his friend; in which the malignity of one is sometimes defeated by the frolic of another; and many mischiefs and many benefits are done and hindered without design.

Out of this chaos of mingled purposes and casualties⁶ the ancient poets, according to the laws which custom had prescribed, selected some the crimes of men, and some their absurdities; some the momentous vicissitudes of life, and some the lighter occurrences; some the terrors of distress, and some the gaieties of prosperity. Thus rose the two modes of imitation, known by the names of tragedy and comedy, compositions intended to promote different ends by contrary means, and considered as so little allied, that I do not recollect among the Greeks or Romans a single writer who attempted both.

Shakespeare has united the powers of exciting laughter and sorrow not only in one mind but in one composition. Almost all his plays are divided between serious and ludicrous characters, and, in the successive evolutions of the design, sometimes produce seriousness and sorrow, and sometimes levity and laughter.

That this is a practice contrary to the rules of criticism⁷ will be readily allowed, but there is always an appeal open from criticism to nature. The end of writing is to instruct; the end of poetry is to instruct by pleasing.⁸ That the mingled drama may convey all the instruction of tragedy or comedy cannot be denied, rules of criticism Set forth by Horace and Sir Philip Sidney, among others.

⁶ casualties Chance occurrences.

The end ... pleasing An idea that originated from Horace's Art of Poetry: "The poet's aim is either to profit or to please, or to blend in one the delightful and the useful."

mazed Bewildered.

confessor I.e., a priest.

Dennis and Rymer John Dennis, playwright and literary critic, author of An Essay on the Genius and Writing of Shakespeare (1712), and Thomas Rymer, historian and drama critic, author of A Short View of Tragedy (1693).

¹ Voltaire French philosopher; this criticism of Shakespeare occurs in his Appeal to All the Nations of Europe (1761).

Dennis is ... drunkard References to Menenius of Coriolanus, who describes himself as a buffoon in 2.1, and to King Claudius in Hamlet.

because it includes both in its alternations of exhibition, and approaches nearer than either to the appearance of life by showing how great machinations and slender designs may promote or obviate one another, and the high and the low co-operate in the general system by unavoidable concatenation.¹

It is objected that by this change of scenes the passions are interrupted in their progression, and that the principal event, being not advanced by a due gradation of preparatory incidents, wants at last the power to move, which constitutes the perfection of dramatic poetry. This reasoning is so specious, that it is received as true even by those who in daily experience feel it to be false. The interchanges of mingled scenes seldom fail to produce the intended vicissitudes of passion. Fiction cannot move so much, but that the attention may be easily transferred; and though it must be allowed that pleasing melancholy be sometimes interrupted by unwelcome levity, yet let it be considered likewise, that melancholy is often not pleasing, and that the disturbance of one man may be the relief of another; that different auditors have different habitudes; and that, upon the whole, all pleasure consists in variety.

The players, who in their edition divided our author's works into comedies, histories, and tragedies, seem not to have distinguished the three kinds, by any very exact or definite ideas.

An action which ended happily to the principal persons, however serious or distressful through its intermediate incidents, in their opinion constituted a comedy. This idea of a comedy continued long amongst us, and plays were written, which, by changing the catastrophe, were tragedies today and comedies tomorrow.

Tragedy was not in those times a poem of more general dignity or elevation than comedy; it required only a calamitous conclusion, with which the common criticism of that age was satisfied, whatever lighter pleasure it afforded in its progress.

History was a series of actions, with no other than chronological succession, independent of each other, and without any tendency to introduce or regulate the conclusion. It is not always very nicely distinguished from tragedy. There is not much nearer approach to unity of action in the tragedy of Antony and Cleopatra, than in the history of Richard the Second. But a history might be continued through many plays; as it had no plan, it had no limits.

Through all these denominations of the drama, Shakespeare's mode of composition is the same; an interchange of seriousness and merriment, by which the mind is softened at one time, and exhilarated at another. But whatever be his purpose, whether to gladden or depress, or to conduct the story, without vehemence or emotion, through tracts of easy and familiar dialogue, he never fails to attain his purpose; as he commands us, we laugh or mourn, or sit silent with quiet expectation, in tranquillity without indifference.

When Shakespeare's plan is understood, most of the criticisms of Rymer and Voltaire vanish away. The play of Hamlet is opened, without impropriety, by two sentinels; Iago bellows at Brabantio's window, without injury to the scheme of the play, though in terms which a modern audience would not easily endure; the character of Polonius is seasonable and useful; and the gravediggers themselves may be heard with applause.²

Shakespeare engaged in the dramatic poetry with the world open before him; the rules of the ancients were yet known to few; the public judgement was unformed; he had no example of such fame as might force him upon imitation, nor critics of such authority as might restrain his extravagance. He therefore indulged his natural disposition, and his disposition, as Rymer has remarked, led him to comedy. In tragedy he often writes with great appearance of toil and study, what is written at last with little felicity; but in his comic scenes, he seems to produce, without labour, what no labour can improve. In tragedy he is always struggling after some occasion to be comic, but in comedy he seems to repose, or to luxuriate, as in a mode of thinking congenial to his nature. In his tragic scenes there is always something wanting, but his comedy often surpasses expectation or desire. His comedy pleases by the thoughts and the language, and his tragedy for the greater part by incident and action. His tragedy seems to be skill, his comedy to be instinct.

Iago ... applause Iago is a character in Othello. Polonius and the gravediggers are characters in Hamlet.

¹ concatenation Linkage, union.

The force of his comic scenes has suffered little diminution from the changes made by a century and a half, in manners or in words. As his personages act upon principles arising from genuine passion, very little modified by particular forms, their pleasures and vexations are communicable to all times and to all places; they are natural, and therefore durable; the adventitious peculiarities of personal habits are only superficial dyes, bright and pleasing for a little while, yet soon fading to a dim tinct, without any remains of former lustre; but the discriminations of true passion are the colours of nature; they pervade the whole mass, and can only perish with the body that exhibits them. The accidental compositions of heterogeneous modes are dissolved by the chance which combined them; but the uniform simplicity of primitive qualities neither admits increase, nor suffers decay. The sand heaped by one flood is scattered by another, but the rock always continues in its place. The stream of time, which is continually washing the dissoluble fabrics of other poets, passes without injury by the adamant of Shakespeare.

If there be, what I believe there is, in every nation a style which never becomes obsolete, a certain mode of phraseology so consonant and congenial to the analogy¹ and principles of its respective language as to remain settled and unaltered; this style is probably to be sought in the common intercourse of life, among those who speak only to be understood, without ambition of elegance. The polite are always catching modish innovations, and the learned depart from established forms of speech in hope of finding or making better; those who wish for distinction forsake the vulgar,² when the vulgar is right; but there is a conversation above grossness and below refinement where propriety resides, and where this poet seems to have gathered his comic dialogue. He is therefore more agreeable to the ears of the present age than any other author equally remote, and among his other excellencies deserves to be studied as one of the original masters of our language.

These observations are to be considered not as unexceptionably constant, but as containing general and predominant truth. Shakespeare's familiar dialogue is affirmed to be smooth and clear, yet not wholly without ruggedness or difficulty; as a country may be eminently fruitful, though it has spots unfit for cultivation. His characters are praised as natural though their sentiments are sometimes forced and their actions improbable, as the earth upon the whole is spherical though its surface is varied with protuberances and cavities.

Shakespeare with his excellencies has likewise faults, and faults sufficient to obscure and overwhelm any other merit. I shall show them in the proportion in which they appear to me, without envious malignity or superstitious veneration. No question can be more innocently discussed than a dead poet's pretensions to renown; and little regard is due to that bigotry which sets candour higher than truth.

His first defect is that to which may be imputed most of the evil in books or in men. He sacrifices virtue to convenience, and is so much more careful to please than to instruct that he seems to write without any moral purpose. From his writings indeed a system of social duty may be selected, for he that thinks reasonably must think morally; but his precepts and axioms drop casually from him; he makes no just distribution of good or evil, nor is always careful to show in the virtuous a disapprobation of the wicked; he carries his persons indifferently through right and wrong, and at the close dismisses them without further care, and leaves their examples to operate by chance. This fault the barbarity of his age cannot extenuate; for it is always a writer's duty to make the world better, and justice is a virtue independent on time or place.

The plots are often so loosely formed that a very slight consideration may improve them, and so carelessly pursued, that he seems not always fully to comprehend his own design. He omits opportunities of instructing or delighting which the train of his story seems to force upon him, and apparently rejects those exhibitions which would be more affecting for the sake of those which are more easy.

It may be observed that in many of his plays the latter part is evidently neglected. When he found himself near the end of his work, and in view of his reward, he shortened the labour to snatch the profit. He therefore remits his efforts where he should most analogy Formative processes.

vulgar Common.

vigorously exert them, and his catastrophe¹ is improbably produced or imperfectly represented.

He had no regard to distinction of time or place, but gives to one age or nation, without scruple, the customs, institutions, and opinions of another, at the expense not only of likelihood, but of possibility. These faults Pope has endeavoured, with more zeal than judgement, to transfer to his imagined interpolators.² We need not wonder to find Hector quoting Aristotle when we see the loves of Theseus and Hippolyta combined with the Gothic mythology of fairies.³ Shakespeare, indeed, was not the only violator of chronology, for in the same age Sidney,⁴ who wanted not the advantages of learning, has, in his Arcadia, confounded the pastoral with the feudal times, the days of innocence, quiet, and security, with those of turbulence, violence, and adventure.

In his comic scenes he is seldom very successful when he engages his characters in reciprocations of smartness and contests of sarcasm; their jests are commonly gross and their pleasantry licentious; neither his gentlemen nor his ladies have much delicacy, nor are sufficiently distinguished from his clowns⁵ by any appearance of refined manners. Whether he represented the real conversation of his time is not easy to determine; the reign of Elizabeth is commonly supposed to have been a time of stateliness, formality, and reserve; yet perhaps the relaxations of that severity were not very elegant. There must, however, have been always some modes of gaiety preferable to others, and a writer ought to choose the best.

In tragedy his performance seems constantly to be worse, as his labour is more. The effusions of passion which exigence forces out are for the most part striking and energetic; but whenever he solicits his invention, or strains his faculties, the offspring of his throes is tumour, meanness,⁶ tediousness, and obscurity.

In narration he affects a disproportionate pomp of diction and a wearisome train of circumlocution, and tells the incident imperfectly in many words which might have been more plainly delivered in few. Narration in dramatic poetry is naturally tedious, as it is unanimated and inactive and obstructs the progress of the action; it should therefore always be rapid and enlivened by frequent interruption. Shakespeare found it an encumbrance and, instead of lightening it by brevity, endeavoured to recommend it by dignity and splendour.

His declamations or set speeches are commonly cold and weak, for his power was the power of nature; when he endeavoured, like other tragic writers, to catch opportunities of amplification and, instead of inquiring what the occasion demanded, to show how much his stores of knowledge could supply, he seldom escapes without the pity or resentment of his reader. ...

The objection arising⁷ from the impossibility of passing the first hour at Alexandria and the next at Rome supposes that when the play opens the spectator really imagines himself at Alexandria and believes that his walk to the theatre has been a voyage to Egypt, and that he lives in the days of Antony and Cleopatra. Surely he that imagines this may imagine more. He that can take the stage at one time for the palace of the Ptolemies may take it in half an hour for the promontory of Actium. Delusion, if delusion be admitted, has no certain limitation; if the spectator can be once persuaded that his old acquaintance are Alexander and Caesar, that a room illuminated with candles is the plain of Pharsalia or the bank of Granicus,⁸ he is in a state of elevation above the reach of reason, or of truth, and from the heights of empyrean poetry may despise the circumscriptions of terrestrial nature. There is no reason why a his imagined interpolators I.e., those who published his plays. In his preface, Pope claimed that many of the faults in Shakespeare's plays were introduced by publishers, not by the writer himself.

¹ catastrophe Conclusion.

We need ... fairies Hector quotes Aristotle in Troilus and Cressida, 2.2.166–67; in A Midsummer Night's Dream, the characters of Theseus and Hippolyta parallel those of Oberon and Titania, the King and Queen of the fairies.

Sidney Sir Philip Sidney, English poet and courtier.

clowns Yokels.

⁶ tumour Turgidity of language or style; meanness Baseness.

The objection arising This and the following paragraphs reference the classical unities, a set of three guidelines for structuring plays. According to the unities, a play should have unity of action (it should focus on a single plot), unity of time (the whole play should be set in a single day), and unity of place (the action should occur in a single setting). These rules, developed from commendments made by Aristotle, were embraced by neoclassical critics.

⁸ plain of ... Granicus Locations of the victories of Julius Caesar and Alexander the Great, respectively.

mind thus wandering in ecstasy should count the clock, or why an hour should not be a century in that calen-¹ture¹ of the brains that can make the stage a field.

The truth is that the spectators are always in their senses and know, from the first act to the last, that the stage is only a stage and that the players are only players. They came to hear a certain number of lines recited with just gesture and elegant modulation. The lines relate to some action, and an action must be in some place; but the different actions that complete a story may be in places very remote from each other; and where is the absurdity of allowing that space to represent first Athens and then Sicily which was always known to be neither Sicily nor Athens, but a modern theatre?

By supposition, as place is introduced time may be extended; the time required by the fable elapses for the most part between the acts; for, of so much of the action as is represented, the real and poetical duration is the same. If in the first act preparations for war against Mithridates are represented to be made in Rome, the event of the war may without absurdity be represented, in the castastrophe, as happening in Pontus; we know that there is neither war nor preparation for war; we know that we are neither in Rome nor Pontus; that neither Mithridates nor Lucullus² are before us. The drama exhibits successive imitations of successive actions, and why may not the second imitation represent an action that happened years after the first if it be so connected with it that nothing but time can be supposed to intervene? Time is, of all modes of existence, most obsequious to the imagination; a lapse of years is as easily conceived as a passage of hours. In contemplation we easily contract the time of real actions, and therefore willingly permit it to be contracted when we only see their imitation.

It will be asked how the drama moves if it is not credited. It is credited with all the credit due to a drama. It is credited, whenever it moves, as a just picture of a real original, as representing to the auditor what he would himself feel if he were to do or suffer what is there feigned to be suffered or to be done. The reflection that strikes the heart is not that the evils before us are real evils, but that they are evils to which we ourselves may be exposed. If there be any fallacy, it is not that we fancy the players, but that we fancy ourselves unhappy for a moment; but we rather lament the possibility than suppose the presence of misery, as a mother weeps over her babe when she remembers that death may take it from her. The delight of tragedy proceeds from our consciousness of fiction; if we thought murders and treasons real, they would please no more.

Imitations produce pain or pleasure not because they are mistaken for realities, but because they bring realities to mind. When the imagination is recreated³ by a painted landscape, the trees are not supposed capable to give us shade, or the fountains coolness; but we consider how we should be pleased with such fountains playing beside us and such woods waving over us. We are agitated in reading the history of Henry the Fifth, yet no man takes his book for the field of Agincourt.⁴ A dramatic exhibition is a book recited with concomitants that increase or diminish its effect. Familiar⁵ comedy is often more powerful in the theatre than on the page; imperial tragedy is always less. The humour of Petruchio may be heightened by grimace; but what voice or what gesture can hope to add dignity or force to the soliloquy of Cato?⁶

A play read affects the mind like a play acted. It is therefore evident that the action is not supposed to be real, and it follows that between the acts a longer or shorter time may be allowed to pass, and that no more account of space or duration is to be taken by the auditor of a drama than by the reader of a narrative, before whom may pass in an hour the life of a hero or the revolutions of an empire.

recreated Enlivened.

field of Agincourt Site of Henry V's 1415 defeat of French troops, depicted in Act 4 of Shakespeare's Henry V.

Familiar Domestic.

Petruchio Protagonist of The Taming of the Shrew; Cato Protagonist of Joseph Addison's Cato (1713), who contemplates suicide in a famous soliloquy (5.1).

¹ calenture Fever.

Mithridates ... Lucullus King of Pontus and his Roman opponent, both of whom are characters in the tragedy Mithridates (1678) by Nathaniel Lee.

Whether Shakespeare knew the unities¹ and rejected them by design, or deviated from them by happy ignorance, it is, I think, impossible to decide and useless to inquire. We may reasonably suppose that when he rose to notice he did not want² the counsels and admonitions of scholars and critics, and that he at last deliberately persisted in a practice which he might have begun by chance. As nothing is essential to the fable but unity of action, and as the unities of time and place arise evidently from false assumptions, and, by circumscribing the extent of the drama, lessen its variety, I cannot think it much to be lamented that they were not known by him, or not observed; nor, if such another poet could arise, should I very vehemently reproach him that his first act passed at Venice, and his next in Cyprus.³ Such violations of rules merely positive⁴ become the comprehensive genius of Shakespeare, and such censures are suitable to the minute and slender criticism of Voltaire:

*Non usque adeo permiscuit imis
Longus summa dies, ut non, si voce Metelli
Serventur leges, malint a Caesare tolli.*⁵

Yet when I speak thus slightly of dramatic rules, I cannot but recollect how much wit and learning may be produced against me; before such authorities I am afraid to stand, not that I think the present question one of those that are to be decided by mere authority, but because it is to be suspected that these precepts have not been so easily received but for better reasons than I have yet been able to find. The result of my inquiries, in which it would be ludicrous to boast of impartiality, is that the unities of time and place are not essential to a the unities The unities, derived from Aristotle's Poetics (c. 335 BCE), are three rules for the structuring of plays. The unity of action demands that all the events in the play be part of a single plot; the unities of place and time require that the action occur in one location and in a single day. Though they were embraced earlier in France and Italy, the unities did not become influential in England until the later seventeenth century.

want Lack.

¹ first act ... Cyprus As in the first two acts of Othello.

² positive Proceeding from custom and arbitrarily instituted.

Non ... tolli Latin: "The course of time does not bring such confusion that the laws would not rather be trampled upon by a Caesar than saved by a Metellus." From Lucan's Pharsalia (3.138–40), an epic poem of the Roman civil wars. Metellus was a minor Roman politician.

just drama, that though they may sometimes conduce to pleasure, they are always to be sacrificed to the nobler beauties of variety and instruction; and that a play, written with nice observation of critical rules, is to be contemplated as an elaborate curiosity, as the product of superfluous and ostentatious art, by which is shown rather what is possible than what is necessary.

He that, without diminution of any other excellence, shall preserve all the unities unbroken deserves the like applause with the architect who shall display all the orders⁶ of architecture in a citadel without any deduction from its strength; but the principal beauty of a citadel is to exclude the enemy, and the greatest graces of a play are to copy nature and instruct life.

—1765

from Lives of the English Poets

from JOHN MILTON

I am now to examine Paradise Lost, a poem which, considered with respect to design, may claim the first place, and with respect to performance the second,⁷ among the productions of the human mind.

By the general consent of critics the first praise of genius is due to the writer of an epic poem, as it requires an assemblage of all the powers which are singly sufficient for other compositions. Poetry is the art of uniting pleasure with truth, by calling imagination to the help of reason. Epic poetry undertakes to teach the most important truths by the most pleasing precepts, and therefore relates some great event in the most affecting manner. History must supply the writer with the rudiments of narration, which he must improve and exalt by a nobler art, must animate by dramatic energy, and diversify by retrospection and anticipation; morality must teach him the exact bounds and different shades of vice and virtue; from policy and the practice of life he has to learn the discriminations of character and the tendency of the passions, either single or combined; and physiology must supply him with illustrations and images. To put these materials to poetical use is required an imagination capable of painting nature and realizing fiction. Nor is he yet a poet till he has attained the whole extension of his language, distinguished all the delicacies of phrase, and all the colours of words, and learned to adjust their different sounds to all the varieties of metrical modulation.

⁶ all the orders I.e., Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian.

⁷ second With Homer's Iliad presumably ranked first.

Bossu¹ is of opinion that the poet's first work is to find a moral, which his fable is afterwards to illustrate and establish. This seems to have been the process only of Milton: the moral of other poems is incidental and consequent; in Milton's only it is essential and intrinsic. His purpose was the most useful and the most arduous: "to vindicate the ways of God to man";² to show the reasonableness of religion, and the necessity of obedience to the Divine Law.

To convey this moral there must be a fable, a narration artfully constructed so as to excite curiosity and surprise expectation. In this part of his work Milton must be confessed to have equalled every other poet. He has involved in his account of the Fall of Man the events which preceded, and those that were to follow it: he has interwoven the whole system of theology with such propriety that every part appears to be necessary, and scarcely any recital is wished shorter for the sake of quickening the progress of the main action.

The subject of an epic poem is naturally an event of great importance. That of Milton is not the destruction of a city, the conduct of a colony, or the foundation of an empire. His subject is the fate of worlds, the revolutions of heaven and of earth; rebellion against the Supreme King raised by the highest order of created beings; the overthrow of their host and the punishment of their crime; the creation of a new race of reasonable creatures; their original happiness and innocence, their forfeiture of immortality, and their restoration to hope and peace.

Great events can be hastened or retarded only by persons of elevated dignity. Before the greatness displayed in Milton's poem all other greatness shrinks away. The weakest of his agents are the highest and noblest of human beings, the original parents of mankind; with whose actions the elements consented, on whose rectitude or deviation of will depended the state of terrestrial nature and the condition of all the future inhabitants of the globe. Of the other agents in the poem the chief are such as it is irreverence to name on slight occasions. The rest were lower powers; of which the least could wield

Those elements, and arm him with the force
Of all their regions;³

powers which only the control of Omnipotence restrains from laying creation waste and filling the vast expanse of space with ruin and confusion. To display the motives and actions of beings thus superior, so far as human reason can examine them or human imagination represent them, is the task which this mighty poet has undertaken and performed.

In the examination of epic poems much speculation is commonly employed upon the characters. The characters in the Paradise Lost which admit of examination are those of angels and of man; of angels good and evil, of man in his innocent and sinful state.

Among the angels the virtue of Raphael is mild and placid, of easy condescension and free communication; that of Michael is regal and lofty, and, as may seem, attentive to the dignity of his own nature. Abdiel and Gabriel appear occasionally and act as every incident requires; the solitary fidelity of Abdiel is very amiably painted.

Of the evil angels the characters are more diversified. To Satan, as Addison observes, such sentiments are given as suit "the most exalted and most depraved being."⁴ Milton has been censured by Clarke⁵ for the impiety which sometimes breaks from Satan's mouth. For there are thoughts, as he justly remarks, which no observation of character can justify, because no good man would willingly permit them to pass, however transiently, through his own mind. To make Satan speak as a rebel, without any such expressions as might taint the reader's imagination, was indeed one of the great difficulties in Milton's undertaking, and I cannot ¹ Bossu French abbot René le Bossu. The opinion referred to is expressed in his Treatise on the Epic Poem (1675).

² to vindicate ... man A misquote of Paradise Lost 1.26, "justify the ways of God to men." Alexander Pope's Essay on Man, however, hoped to "vindicate the ways of God to man" (1.16).

³ of which ... regions From Paradise Lost 6.221–23.

the most ... being From essay no. 303 in The Spectator.

⁵ Clarke John Clarke, who criticizes Milton in his Essay upon Study (1731).

but think that he has extricated himself with great happiness. There is in Satan's speeches little that can give pain to a pious ear. The language of rebellion cannot be the same with that of obedience. The malignity of Satan foams in haughtiness and obstinacy; but his expressions are commonly general, and no otherwise offensive than as they are wicked.

The other chiefs of the celestial rebellion are very judiciously discriminated in the first and second books; and the ferocious character of Moloch appears, both in the battle and the council, with exact consistency.

To Adam and to Eve are given during their innocence such sentiments as innocence can generate and utter. Their love is pure benevolence and mutual veneration; their repasts are without luxury and their diligence without toil. Their addresses to their Maker have little more than the voice of admiration and gratitude. Fruition left them nothing to ask, and Innocence left them nothing to fear.

But with guilt enter distrust and discord, mutual accusation, and stubborn self-defence; they regard each other with alienated minds and dread their Creator as the avenger of their transgression. At last they seek shelter in his mercy, soften to repentance, and melt in supplication. Both before and after the Fall the superiority of Adam is diligently sustained.

Of the probable and the marvellous, two parts of a vulgar¹ epic poem which immerge² the critic in deep consideration, the Paradise Lost requires little to be said. It contains the history of a miracle, of Creation and Redemption; it displays the power and the mercy of the Supreme Being; the probable therefore is marvellous, and the marvellous is probable. The substance of the narrative is truth; and as truth allows no choice, it is, like necessity, superior to rule. To the accidental or adventitious parts, as to every thing human, some slight exceptions may be made. But the main fabric is immovably supported. . . .

In Milton every line breathes sanctity of thought and purity of manners, except when the train of the narration requires the introduction of the rebellious spirits; and even they are compelled to acknowledge their subjection to God in such a manner as excites reverence and confirms piety.

Of human beings there are but two; but those two are the parents of mankind, venerable before their fall for dignity and innocence, and amiable after it for repentance and submission. In their first state their affection is tender without weakness and their pity sublime without presumption. When they have sinned they show how discord begins in mutual frailty, and how it ought to cease in mutual forbearance; how confidence of the divine favour is forfeited by sin, and how hope of pardon may be obtained by penitence and prayer. A state of innocence we can only conceive, if indeed in our present misery it be possible to conceive it; but the sentiments and worship proper to a fallen and offending being we have all to learn, as we have all to practise.

The poet, whatever be done, is always great. Our progenitors in their first state conversed with angels; even when folly and sin had degraded them they had not in their humiliation "the port of mean suitors;"³ and they rise again to reverential regard when we find that their prayers were heard.

As human passions did not enter the world before the Fall, there is in the Paradise Lost little opportunity for the pathetic; but what little there is has not been lost. That passion which is peculiar to rational nature, the anguish arising from the consciousness of transgression and the horrors attending the sense of the Divine Displeasure, are very justly described and forcibly impressed. But the passions are moved only on one occasion; sublimity is the general and prevailing quality of this poem—sublimity variously modified, sometimes descriptive, sometimes argumentative.⁴ . . .

Milton would not have excelled in dramatic writing; he knew human nature only in the gross, and had never studied the shades of character, nor the combinations of concurring or the perplexity of contending passions. He had read much and knew what books could teach; but had mingled little in the world, and was deficient in the knowledge which experience must confer.

Through all his greater works there prevails an uniform peculiarity of diction, a mode and cast of ³ the port . . . suitors From Paradise Lost 11.8–9.

⁴ argumentative I.e., contributing to the argument, or theme, of the poem.

vulgar Common, familiar.

² immerge Immerse.

expression which bears little resemblance to that of any former writer, and which is so far removed from common use that an unlearned reader when he first opens his book finds himself surprised by a new language.

This novelty has been, by those who can find nothing wrong in Milton, imputed to his laborious endeavours after words suitable to the grandeur of his ideas. "Our language," says Addison, "sunk under him."¹ But the truth is that, both in prose and verse, he had formed his style by a perverse and pedantic principle. He was desirous to use English words with a foreign idiom. This in all his prose is discovered and condemned, for there judgement operates freely, neither softened by the beauty nor awed by the dignity of his thoughts; but such is the power of his poetry that his call is obeyed without resistance, the reader feels himself in captivity to a higher and a nobler mind, and criticism sinks in admiration.

Milton's style was not modified by his subject: what is shown with greater extent in Paradise Lost may be found in Comus.² One source of his peculiarity was his familiarity with the Tuscan poets: the disposition of his words is, I think, frequently Italian; perhaps sometimes combined with other tongues. Of him, at last, may be said what Jonson says of Spenser, that "he wrote no language,"³ but has formed what Butler calls "a Babylonish dialect,"⁴ in itself harsh and barbarous, but made by exalted genius and extensive learning the vehicle of so much instruction and so much pleasure that, like other lovers, we find grace in its deformity.

Whatever be the faults of his diction he cannot want the praise of copiousness and variety; he was master of his language in its full extent, and has selected the melodious words with such diligence that from his book alone the art of English poetry might be learned.

After his diction something must be said of his versification. "The measure," he says, "is the English heroic verse without rhyme."⁵ Of this mode he had many examples among the Italians, and some in his own country. The Earl of Surrey⁶ is said to have translated one of Virgil's books without rhyme, and besides our tragedies a few short poems had appeared in blank verse; particularly one tending to reconcile the nation to Raleigh's wild attempt upon Guiana,⁷ and probably written by Raleigh himself. These petty performances cannot be supposed to have much influenced Milton, who more probably took his hint from Trisino's Italia Liberata,⁸ and, finding blank verse easier than rhyme, was desirous of persuading himself that it is better.

"Rhyme," he says, and says truly, "is no necessary adjunct of true poetry."⁹ But perhaps of poetry as a mental operation metre or music is no necessary adjunct; it is however by the music of metre that poetry has been discriminated in all languages, and in languages melodiously constructed with a due proportion of long and short syllables metre is sufficient. But one language cannot communicate its rules to another; where metre is scanty and imperfect some help is necessary. The music of the English heroic line strikes the ear so faintly that it is easily lost, unless all the syllables of every line cooperate together; this cooperation can be only obtained by the preservation of every verse unmingled with another as a distinct system of sounds, and this distinctness is obtained and preserved by the artifice of rhyme. The variety of pauses, so much boasted by the lovers of blank verse, changes the measures of an English poet to the periods of a declaimer; and there are only a few skilful and happy readers of Milton who enable their audience to perceive where the lines end or begin. "Blank verse," said an ingenious critic,¹⁰ "seems to be verse only to the eye."

Poetry may subsist without rhyme, but English poetry will not often please; nor can rhyme ever be safely spared but where the subject is able to support

¹ Our ... him From Spectator no. 297.

Comus Masque by Milton.

² Jonson ... language Poet Ben Jonson in his Timber, or Discoveries (1640), no. 116.

Butler ... dialect Seventeenth-century poet Samuel Butler, in his satire Hudibras (1663), 1.1.93.

The measure ... rhyme From Milton's preface to Paradise Lost.

⁶ Earl of Surrey Henry Howard (1517–47), who completed blank-verse translations of books 2 and 4 of Virgil's Aeneid.

Raleigh's ... Guiana Sir Walter Raleigh had, in 1595, led a search in Venezuela for the fabled Eldorado. The poem referred to is "Of Guiana, an Epic Song" (1596), actually by George Chapman.

Trisino's Italia Liberata The epic poem Italy Delivered from the Goths (1547–48) by Giovanni Giorgio.

⁹ Rhyme ... poetry From the preface to Paradise Lost.

¹⁰ ingenious critic In his Life of Johnson 4.43, Boswell says this statement was made by art critic William Locke (1732–1810).

itself. Blank verse makes some approach to that which is called the "lapidary style,"¹ has neither the easiness of prose nor the melody of numbers, and therefore tires by long continuance. Of the Italian writers without rhyme, whom Milton alleges as precedents, not one is popular; what reason could urge in its defence has been confuted by the ear.

But, whatever be the advantage of rhyme, I cannot prevail on myself to wish that Milton had been a rhymers, for I cannot wish his work to be other than it is; yet like other heroes he is to be admired rather than imitated. He that thinks himself capable of astonishing may write blank verse, but those that hope only to please must condescend to rhyme.

The highest praise of genius is original invention. Milton cannot be said to have contrived the structure of an epic poem, and therefore owes reverence to that vigour and amplitude of mind to which all generations must be indebted for the art of poetical narration, for the texture of the fable, the variation of incidents, the interposition of dialogue, and all the stratagems that surprise and enchain attention. But of all the borrowers from Homer, Milton is perhaps the least indebted. He was naturally a thinker for himself, confident of his own abilities and disdainful of help or hindrance; he did not refuse admission to the thoughts or images of his predecessors, but he did not seek them. From his contemporaries he neither courted nor received support; there is in his writings nothing by which the pride of other authors might be gratified or favour gained, no exchange of praise nor solicitation of support. His great works were performed under discountenance and in blindness, but difficulties vanished at his touch; he was born for whatever is arduous; and his work is not the greatest of heroic poems, only because it is not the first.

—1779

from ALEXANDER POPE

The person of Pope is well known not to have been formed by the nicest model. He has, in his account of the "Little Club,"² compared himself to a spider, and by another is described as protuberant behind and before. He is said to have been beautiful in his infancy; but he was of a constitution originally feeble and weak, and, as bodies of a tender frame are easily distorted, his deformity was probably in part the effect of his application. His stature was so low that to bring him to a level with common tables it was necessary to raise his seat. But his face was not displeasing, and his eyes were animated and vivid.

By natural deformity or accidental distortion his vital functions were so much disordered that his life was a "long disease."³ His most frequent assailant was the headache, which he used to relieve by inhaling the steam of coffee, which he very frequently required.

Most of what can be told concerning his petty peculiarities was communicated by a female domestic of the Earl of Oxford, who knew him perhaps after the middle of life. He was then so weak as to stand in perpetual need of female attendance; extremely sensible of cold, so that he wore a kind of fur doublet under a shirt of very coarse warm linen with fine sleeves. When he rose he was invested in a bodice made of stiff canvas, being scarce able to hold himself erect till they were laced, and he then put on a flannel waistcoat. One side was contracted. His legs were so slender that he enlarged their bulk with three pair of stockings, which were drawn on and off by the maid; for he was not able to dress or undress himself, and neither went to bed nor rose without help. His weakness made it very difficult for him to be clean.

His hair had fallen almost all away, and he used to dine sometimes with Lord Oxford, privately, in a velvet cap. His dress of ceremony was black, with a tie-wig and a little sword ...

His declaration that his care for his works ceased at their publication was not strictly true. His parental attention never abandoned them; what he found amiss in the first edition, he silently corrected in those that followed. He appears to have revised the Iliad and freed it from some of its imperfections, and the Essay on Criticism received many improvements after its first appearance. It will seldom be found that he altered lapidary style Style characteristic of monument inscriptions.

² his account ... Club Pope's account appears in Guardian no. 92.

³ long disease From Pope's "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot," line 132: "This long disease, my life."

without adding clearness, elegance, or vigour. Pope had perhaps the judgement of Dryden; but Dryden certainly wanted the diligence of Pope.

In acquired knowledge the superiority must be allowed to Dryden, whose education was more scholastic¹ and who before he became an author had been allowed more time for study, with better means of information. His mind has a larger range, and he collects his images and illustrations from a more extensive circumference of science. Dryden knew more of man in his general nature, and Pope in his local manners. The notions of Dryden were formed by comprehensive speculation, and those of Pope by minute attention. There is more dignity in the knowledge of Dryden, and more certainty in that of Pope.

Poetry was not the sole praise of either, for both excelled likewise in prose; but Pope did not borrow his prose from his predecessor. The style of Dryden is capricious and varied, that of Pope is cautious and uniform; Dryden obeys the motions of his own mind, Pope constrains his mind to his own rules of composition. Dryden is sometimes vehement and rapid; Pope is always smooth, uniform, and gentle. Dryden's page is a natural field, rising into inequalities, and diversified by the varied exuberance of abundant vegetation; Pope's is a velvet lawn, shaven by the scythe, and levelled by the roller.

Of genius, that power which constitutes a poet; that quality without which judgement is cold and knowledge is inert; that energy which collects, combines, amplifies, and animates—the superiority must, with some hesitation, be allowed to Dryden. It is not to be inferred that of this poetical vigour Pope had only a little, because Dryden had more, for every other writer since Milton must give place to Pope; and even of Dryden it must be said that if he has brighter paragraphs, he has not better poems. Dryden's performances were always hasty, either excited by some external occasion, or extorted by domestic necessity; he composed without consideration, and published without correction. What his mind could supply at call, or gather in one excursion, was all that he sought, and all that he gave. The dilatory caution of Pope enabled him to condense his sentiments, to multiply his images, and to accumulate all that study might produce, or chance might supply. If the flights of Dryden therefore are higher, Pope continues longer on the wing. If of Dryden's fire the blaze is brighter, of Pope's the heat is more regular and constant. Dryden often surpasses expectation, and Pope never falls below it. Dryden is read with frequent astonishment, and Pope with perpetual delight....

Of The Dunciad the hint is confessedly taken from Dryden's MacFlecknoe, but the plan is so enlarged and diversified as justly to claim the praise of an original, and affords perhaps the best specimen that has yet appeared of personal satire ludicrously pompous.

That the design was moral, whatever the author might tell either his readers or himself, I am not convinced. The first motive was the desire of revenging the contempt with which Theobald had treated his Shakespeare,² and regaining the honour which he had lost, by crushing his opponent. Theobald was not of bulk enough to fill a poem, and therefore it was necessary to find other enemies with other names, at whose expense he might divert the public.

In this design there was petulance and malignity enough; but I cannot think it very criminal. An author places himself uncalled before the tribunal of criticism, and solicits fame at the hazard of disgrace. Dullness or deformity are not culpable in themselves, but may be very justly reproached when they pretend to the honour of wit or the influence of beauty. If bad writers were to pass without reprehension what should restrain them? Impune diem consumpserit ingens "Telephus";³ and upon bad writers only will censure have much effect. The satire which brought Theobald and Moore into contempt dropped impotent from Bentley like the javelin of Priam.⁴

Theobald ... Shakespeare Pope made Lewis Theobald, a Shakespeare scholar who had pointed out several errors in Pope's edition of Shakespeare, the hero of his biting satire The Dunciad.

¹ Impune ... Telephus Latin: "Shall an interminable Telephus consume an entire day with impunity?" (Juvenal's Satires 1.4–5). Telephus was a fifth-century BCE play by the Greek dramatist Euripides.

² Moore James Moore Smythe, who Pope claimed had stolen lines from his Epistle to a Lady for use in a play; Bentley Richard Bentley, a classical scholar who in 1732 produced a controversial edition of Milton's Paradise Lost. Pope satirizes him in both The Dunciad and "An Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot"; [continued ...]

¹ scholastic Systematic; also, pertaining to formal logic.

All truth is valuable, and satirical criticism may be considered as useful when it rectifies error and improves judgement: he that refines the public taste is a public benefactor.

The beauties of this poem are well known; its chief fault is the grossness of its images. Pope and Swift had an unnatural delight in ideas physically impure, such as every other tongue utters with unwillingness, and of which every ear shrinks from the mention.

But even this fault, offensive as it is, may be forgiven for the excellence of other passages, such as the formation and dissolution of Moore, the account of the Traveller, the misfortune of the Florist, and the crowded thoughts and stately numbers which dignify the concluding paragraph.

The alterations which have been made in The Dunciad, not always for the better, require that it should be published, as in the last collection,¹ with all its variations.

The Essay on Man was a work of great labour and long consideration, but certainly not the happiest of Pope's performances. The subject is perhaps not very proper for poetry, and the poet was not sufficiently master of his subject; metaphysical morality was to him a new study, he was proud of his acquisitions, and, supposing himself master of great secrets, was in haste to teach what he had not learned. Thus he tells us, in the first Epistle, that from the nature of the Supreme Being may be deduced an order of beings such as mankind, because Infinite Excellence can do only what is best. He finds out that these beings must be "somewhere," and that "all the question is whether man be in a wrong place."² Surely if, according to the poet's Leibnitzian reasoning,³ we may infer that man ought to be only because he is, we may allow that his place is the right place, because he has it. Supreme Wisdom is not less infallible in disposing than in creating. But what is meant by "somewhere" and "place" and "wrong place" it had been vain to ask Pope, who probably had never asked himself.

Having exalted himself into the chair of wisdom he tells us much that every man knows, and much that he does not know himself; that we see but little, and that the order of the universe is beyond our comprehension, an opinion not very uncommon; and that there is a chain of subordinate beings "from infinite to nothing," of which himself and his readers are equally ignorant. But he gives us one comfort which, without his help, he supposes unattainable, in the position "that though we are fools, yet God is wise."

This Essay affords an egregious instance of the predominance of genius, the dazzling splendour of imagery, and the seductive powers of eloquence. Never were penury of knowledge and vulgarity of sentiment so happily disguised. The reader feels his mind full, though he learns nothing; and when he meets it in its new array no longer knows the talk of his mother and his nurse. When these wonder-working sounds sink into sense and the doctrine of the Essay, disrobed of its ornaments, is left to the powers of its naked excellence, what shall we discover? That we are, in comparison with our Creator, very weak and ignorant; that we do not uphold the chain of existence; and that we could not make one another with more skill than we are made. We may learn yet more: that the arts of human life were copied from the instinctive operations of other animals; that if the world be made for man, it may be said that man was made for geese. To these profound principles of natural knowledge are added some moral instructions equally new: that self-interest well understood will produce social concord; that men are mutual gainers by mutual benefits; that evil is sometimes balanced by good; that human advantages are unstable and fallacious, of uncertain duration and doubtful effect; that our true honour is not to have a great part, but to act it well; that virtue only is our own; and that happiness is always in our power.

Priam King of Troy at the time of the Trojan War. He attempted to kill Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, but his feeble attempt was in vain, and he was then slain by Neoptolemus.

¹ last collection Published by Warburton in 1751.

² somewhere ... place From Essay on Man 1.47–50.

³ Leibnitzian reasoning Reasoning of the sort used by German philosopher and mathematician Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz, who is known for his belief that this is necessarily "the best of all possible worlds."

Surely a man of no very comprehensive search may venture to say that he has heard all this before, but it was never till now recommended by such a blaze of embellishment or such sweetness of melody. The vigorous contraction of some thoughts, the luxuriant amplification of others, the incidental illustrations, and sometimes the dignity, sometimes the softness of the verses, enchain philosophy, suspend criticism, and oppress judgement by overpowering pleasure.

This is true of many paragraphs; yet if I had undertaken to exemplify Pope's felicity of composition before a rigid critic I should not select the Essay on Man, for it contains more lines unsuccessfully laboured, more harshness of diction, more thoughts imperfectly expressed, more levity without elegance, and more heaviness without strength, than will easily be found in all his other works.

—1781

Letters

TO MRS. THRALE¹

10 July 1780
London

Dear Madam

If Mr. Thrale eats but half his usual quantity, he can hardly eat too much.² It were better however to have some rule, and some security. Last week I saw flesh but twice, and I think fish once, the rest was pease.³

You are afraid, you say, lest I extenuate⁴ myself too fast, and are an enemy to violence: but did you never hear nor read, dear Madam, that every man has his genius, and that the great rule by which all excellence is attained, and all success procured, is to follow genius; and have you not observed in all our conversations that my genius is always in extremes; that I am very noisy, or very silent; very gloomy, or very merry; very sour, or very kind? And would you have me cross my genius, when it leads me sometimes to voracity and sometimes to abstinence? You know that the oracle⁵ said follow your genius. When we get together again (but when, alas, will that be?) you can manage me, and spare me the solicitude of managing myself.

Poor Miss Owen⁶ called on me on Saturday, with that fond and tender application which is natural to misery, when it looks to everybody for that help which nobody can give. I was melted; and soothed and counselled her as well as I could, and am to visit her tomorrow.

She gave a very honourable account of my dear Queeney and says of my master⁷ that she thinks his manner and temper more altered than his looks, but of this alteration she could give no particular account; and all that she could say ended in this, that he is now sleepy in the morning. I do not wonder at the scantiness of her narration, she is too busy within to turn her eyes abroad.

I am glad that Pepys⁸ is come, but hope that resolute temperance will make him unnecessary. I doubt he can do no good to poor Mr. Scrase.⁹

I stay at home to work, and yet do not work diligently; nor can tell when I shall have done, nor perhaps does anybody but myself wish me to have done; for what can they hope I shall do better? yet I wish the work was over, and I was at liberty. And what would I do if I was at liberty? Would I go to see Mrs. Aston and Mrs. Porter,¹⁰ and see the old places, and sigh to find that my

¹ TO MRS. THRALE Hester Thrale, close friend of Johnson.

² If ... much Thrale's husband, Henry, had recently suffered numerous strokes, and his health was continually deteriorating. Nevertheless, he continued to eat what both his doctors believed was an unhealthy amount of food.

³ pease Mashed peas.

⁴ extenuate Spread or make slim. Johnson was then working on his Lives of the Poets.

⁵ the oracle Persius, Roman satirical poet of the first century CE.

⁶ Miss Owen Distant cousin and close childhood friend of Mrs. Thrale.

⁷ Queeney The Thrales's eldest child; my master I.e., Henry Thrale.

⁸ Pepys One of the physicians who treated Mr. Thrale.

⁹ Mr. Scrase Friend of the Thrales.

¹⁰ Mrs. Aston and Mrs. Porter Johnson's friend and his stepdaughter, respectively. The former lived at Lichfield and the second at Stow Hill in Lichfield.

old friends are gone? Would I recall plans of life which I never brought into practice, and hopes of excellence which I once presumed, and never have attained? Would I compare what I now am with what I once expected to have been? Is it reasonable to wish for suggestions of shame, and opportunities of sorrow?

If you please, Madam, we will have an end of this, and contrive some other wishes. I wish I had you in an evening, and I wish I had you in a morning; and I wish I could have a little talk, and see a little frolic. For all this I must stay, but life will not stay.

I will end my letter and go to Blackmore's Life, when I have told you that

I am, &c,

SAM. JOHNSON.

TO MRS. THRALE

19 June 1783

Bolt Court, Fleet Street,

Dear Madam

I am sitting down in no cheerful solitude to write a narrative which would once have affected you with tenderness and sorrow, but which you will perhaps pass over now with the careless glance of frigid indifference. For this diminution of regard, however, I know not whether I ought to blame you, who may have reasons which I cannot know, and I do not blame myself, who have for a great part of human life done you what good I could, and have never done you evil.

I had been disordered in the usual way, and had been relieved by the usual methods, by opium and cathartics, but had rather lessened my dose of opium.

On Monday the 16th I sat for my picture, and walked a considerable way with little inconvenience. In the afternoon and evening I felt myself light and easy, and began to plan schemes of life. Thus I went to bed, and in a short time waked and sat up, as has been long my custom, when I felt a confusion and indistinctness in my head, which lasted I suppose about half a minute; I was alarmed, and prayed God that however he might afflict my body, he would spare my understanding. This prayer, that I might try the integrity of my faculties, I made in Latin verse. The lines were not very good, but I knew them not to be very good: I made them easily, and concluded myself to be unimpaired in my faculties. Soon after I perceived that I had suffered a paralytic stroke, and that my speech was taken from me. I had no pain, and so little dejection in this dreadful state, that I wondered at my own apathy, and considered that perhaps death itself when it should come would excite less horror than seems now to attend it.

In order to rouse the vocal organs I took two drams. Wine has been celebrated for the production of eloquence. I put myself into violent motion, and I think repeated it; but all was vain. I then went to bed, and, strange as it may seem, I think, slept. When I saw light, it was time to contrive what I should do. Though God stopped my speech he left me my hand, I enjoyed a mercy which was not granted to my dear friend Lawrence,¹ who now perhaps overlooks me as I am writing, and rejoices that I have what he wanted. My first note was necessarily to my servant, who came in talking, and could not immediately comprehend why he should read what I put into his hands.

I then wrote a card to Mr Allen,² that I might have a discreet friend at hand to act as occasion should require. In penning this note I had some difficulty; my hand, I knew not how nor why, made wrong letters. I then wrote to Dr. Taylor to come to me, and bring Dr. Heberden, and I sent to Dr. Brocklesby, who is my neighbour. My physicians are very friendly and very disinterested, and give me great hopes, but you may imagine my situation. I have so far recovered my vocal powers as to repeat the Lord's Prayer with no very imperfect articulation. My memory, I hope, yet remains as it was; but such an attack produces solicitude for the safety of every faculty.

How this will be received by you I know not. I hope you will sympathize with me; but perhaps My mistress gracious, mild, and good, Cries! Is he dumb? 'Tis time he shou'd.³

¹ Lawrence Dr. Thomas Lawrence, who had been Johnson's physician for several years, and who had died earlier that month.

² Mr Allen Johnson's landlord and neighbor.

³ My ... shou'd Paraphrase of lines 181–82 of Jonathan Swift's Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift: "The Queen, so gracious, mild and good, / Cries, 'Is he gone? 'tis time he should.'"

But can this be possible? I hope it cannot. I hope that what, when I could speak, I spoke of you, and to you, will be in a sober and serious hour remembered by you; and surely it cannot be remembered but with some degree of kindness. I have loved you with virtuous affection; I have honoured you with sincere esteem. Let not all our endearments be forgotten, but let me have in this great distress your pity and your prayers. You see I yet turn to you with my complaints as a settled and unalienable friend; do not, do not drive me from you, for I have not deserved either neglect or hatred.

To the girls, who do not write often, for Susy has written only once, and Miss Thrale owes me a letter,¹ I earnestly recommend, as their guardian and friend, that they remember their Creator in the days of their youth.

I suppose you may wish to know how my disease is treated by the physicians. They put a blister upon my back, and two from my ear to my throat, one on a side. The blister on the back has done little, and those on the throat have not risen. I bullied and bounced (it sticks to our last sand)² and compelled the apothecary to make his salve according to the Edinburgh Dispensatory,³ that it might adhere better. I have two on now of my own prescription. They likewise give me salt of hartshorn,⁴ which I take with no great confidence, but am satisfied that what can be done is done for me.

O God! give me comfort and confidence in Thee: forgive my sins; and if it be Thy good pleasure, relieve my diseases for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

I am almost ashamed of this querulous letter, but now it is written, let it go.

I am, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON.

the girls ... letter Johnson had been made guardian of the Thrales' children after Henry Thrale's death. Here he mentions two of the daughters, Susanna Arabella and Queeney, the eldest (who is therefore referred to as "Miss Thrale").

it ... sand Reference to Alexander Pope's Epistles to Several Persons, Epistle 1.225, in which he says that a person's ruling passion continues until the end of his life.

Dispensatory Book describing the preparation of medicines.

¹ salts of hartshorn Smelling salts.

TO MRS. THRALE

2 July 1784

Madam

If I interpret your letter right, you are ignominiously married;⁵ if it is yet undone, let us once more talk together. If you have abandoned your children and your religion, God forgive your wickedness; if you have forfeited your fame⁶ and your country, may your folly do no further mischief. If the last act is yet to do, I who have loved you, esteemed you, revered you, and served you, I who long thought you the first of humankind, entreat that, before your fate is irrevocable, I may once more see you. I was, I once was,

Madam, most truly yours,

SAM. JOHNSON

I will come down, if you permit it.

TO MRS. THRALE

8 July 1784

London⁷

Dear Madam

What you have done, however I may lament it, I have no pretence to resent, as it has not been injurious to me: I therefore breathe out one sigh more of tenderness, perhaps useless, but at least sincere.

I wish that God may grant you every blessing, that you may be happy in this world for its short continuance, and eternally happy in a better state; and whatever I can contribute to your happiness I am very ready to repay for that kindness which soothed twenty years of a life radically wretched.

Do not think slightly of the advice which I now presume to offer. Prevail upon Mr. Piozzi to settle in ⁵ If ... married Mrs. Thrale had written to Johnson to inform him that she intended to marry Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian musician. Because Piozzi was Roman Catholic and, as a result of his profession, was seen as her social inferior, and because Hester Thrale was a mature woman not needing or seeking financial support, the marriage was a scandalous one, and it resulted in strained relations between Hester Thrale Piozzi and her family and friends.

⁶ fame Good reputation or character.

8 July ... London Johnson's former letter to Hester Thrale had brought him a severe and dignified letter of reproof.

England. You may live here with more dignity than in Italy, and with more security. Your rank will be higher, and your fortune more under your own eye. I desire not to detail all my reasons, but every argument of prudence and interest is for England, and only some phantoms of imagination seduce you to Italy.

I am afraid however that my counsel is vain, yet I have eased my heart by giving it.

When Queen Mary¹ took the resolution of sheltering herself in England, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, attempting to dissuade her, attended on her journey and, when they came to the irremeable² stream that separated the two kingdoms, walked by her side into the water, in the middle of which he seized her bridle, and, with earnestness proportioned to her danger and his own affection, pressed her to return. The Queen went forward.—If the parallel reaches thus far, may it go no further. The tears stand in my eyes.

I am going into Derbyshire, and hope to be followed by your good wishes, for I am, with great affection,

Your, &c,

SAM. JOHNSON

Any letters that come for me hither will be sent me.

¹ Queen Mary Mary, Queen of Scots, who sought refuge in England from the rebellion in Scotland. In England she was imprisoned and executed for conspiracy against Queen Elizabeth.

² irremeable Through which there is no return.

THOMAS GRAY

1716 – 1771

One of the most celebrated poems in the English language, Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" was written by a man who shunned celebrity and considered himself more a scholar than a poet. Thomas Gray published only a small body of work, but found a wide readership and excited considerable commentary. In the decades immediately following his death, writers such as Johnson, Wordsworth, and Coleridge recognized Gray's importance, and his work continues to be acknowledged as pivotal in the literature of the eighteenth century.

Gray was the fifth of twelve children born to Philip Gray, a scrivener, and Dorothy Antrobus, a milliner. His childhood was not a happy one; none of his siblings survived past infancy, and his mentally unstable father abused his mother. With his mother financing his education, Gray went to Eton in 1725 and spent some of the happiest years of his life in companionship with Horace Walpole (son of the prime minister, Sir Robert Walpole), Richard West, and Thomas Ashton. Interested in reading, poetry and Latin studies (at which Gray became very proficient), the boys formed a "quadruple alliance," in allusion to the 1718 European treaty of that name. After Eton, Gray, Walpole, and Ashton entered the University of Cambridge, while West went to the University of Oxford, but Gray cared for neither the society nor the studies at Cambridge, and he left without a degree in 1738. In 1739, Walpole invited him on an extended tour of the continent. They visited France, Switzerland, and Italy, but then in 1741 they quarrelled, parted, and subsequently remained estranged for several years. Gray returned to Cambridge and corresponded frequently with Richard West, whose health was poor and whose death in 1742 stunned Gray, inspiring not only his "Sonnet on the Death of Mr. Richard West" but elements of his other elegiac poetry as well.

In November 1745, Walpole and Gray were finally reconciled, an event that was central to Gray's literary career, as Walpole would become instrumental in publishing Gray's poetry. Three poems, "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College," "Ode on the Spring," and "Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat, Drowned in a Tub of Gold Fishes" (written about a cat of Walpole's), appeared anonymously in the 1748 Miscellany of Robert Dodsley, the leading London publisher. Gray had also for several years been working on the "Elegy," and in 1750 he sent the finished poem to Walpole, who circulated it in manuscript. This circulation soon forced Gray to publish the poem. He received word of an impending unauthorized version, so he released the poem himself on 15 February 1751, published on its own under the title An Elegy Wrote in a Country Church Yard.

Drawing on traditions that included landscape poetry, the funeral elegy, and graveyard poetry, the "Elegy" drew immediate and widespread praise from both critics and readers. It went through 12 editions by 1763, appeared in several periodicals, was imitated, parodied, and translated into numerous languages, and became arguably the most quoted poem in the English language. The reasons for its popularity were—and still are—as intriguing a subject as the poem itself. Besides simply being an excellently written piece, the poem represents the age: its style embodies neoclassical restraint while its themes echo the sentiments of sensibility, the movement in the mid-century towards the expression of "universal feelings." Samuel Johnson highlighted this characteristic of the poem when he concluded, "I rejoice to concur with the common reader... The Church-yard abounds with images which find a mirrour in every mind, and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo."

After the success of the Elegy, Dodsley published Gray's first collected edition of poems with illustrations by Richard Bentley (1753), and Gray turned to writing more elaborate poetry. In 1757, he was offered the Poet Laureateship, which he declined, and he published two Pindaric odes, "The Progress of Poesy" and "The Bard"—complex, allusive poems that puzzled many readers (and were parodied in two odes to "Oblivion" and "Obscurity"). In later years he studied more and wrote less, took walking tours, and, in 1768, accepted a professorship of modern history at Cambridge. He never married, and his most passionate relationships were with men. In 1769 he met and became devoted to a young Swiss nobleman, Charles Victor de Bonstetten. Gray planned to visit de Bonstetten in Switzerland, but he was taken suddenly ill before he could make the trip; he died in July 1771.

Gray is in many ways a study in contrasts. He is a transitional figure, poised between classicism and romanticism, and his poetry expresses universal themes that are often accompanied by a technically complex style. Because he read widely, he amassed a vast amount of knowledge that makes many of his poems highly allusive. His notebooks record volumes of material from such varied studies as Norse literature, botany, entomology, music, painting, and architecture. Despite his scholarship, he took only one degree (a baccalaureate in civil law, a subject he disliked), never delivered a lecture, and—for such a well-known poet—wrote very little. In temperament, he described himself as melancholic and others described him as socially withdrawn. His letters, however, reveal a superior intellect, a lively wit, and an understanding of his own literary challenges. In sending Walpole the "Elegy," Gray told him to "look upon it in the light of a thing with an end to it; a merit that most of my writings have wanted and are like to want."

*Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College*¹

Ye distant spires, ye antique tow'rs,
That crown the war'ry glade,
Where grateful Science^o still adores
Her Henry's holy shade;²
And ye that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights th' expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead^o survey,
Whose turf, whose shade, whose flow'rs among Wanders the hoary Thames along
His silver-winding way.

Ah, happy hills, ah, pleasing shade,
Ah, fields below'd in vain,
Where once my careless childhood strayed,
A stranger yet to pain!
I feel the gales, that from ye blow,
A momentary bliss bestow,
As waving fresh their gladsome wing,
My weary soul they seem to soothe,
And, redolent of joy and youth,
To breathe a second spring.

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margent^o green
The paths of pleasure trace,
Who foremost now delight to cleave
With pliant arm thy glassy wave?
The captive linnets which enthrall?
What idle progeny succeed

¹ Eton College School for boys that Gray attended from 1725 to 1734.

² Henry's . . . shade The ghost of Henry VI (reigned 1422–61, 1470–71), who founded Eton in 1440. A bronze statue of him was erected at Eton shortly before Gray arrived.

To chase the rolling circle's¹ speed,
Or urge the flying ball?

While some on earnest business bent
Their murm'ring labours ply
'Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint
To sweeten liberty:
Some bold adventurers disdain
The limits of their little reign,
And unknown regions dare descry:
Still as they run they look behind,
They hear a voice in every wind,
And snatch a fearful joy.

Gay hope is theirs by fancy fed,
Less pleasing when possessed;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast:
Theirs buxom^o health of rosy hue,
Wild wit, invention ever-new,
And lively cheer of vigour born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly th' approach of morn.

Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play!
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond today:
Yet see how all around 'em wait
The ministers of human fate,
And black Misfortune's baleful train!
Ah, show them where in ambush stand
To seize their prey the murd'rous band!
Ah, tell them, they are men!

These shall the fury Passions tear,
The vultures of the mind.
Disdainful Anger, pallid Fear,
And Shame that skulks behind;
Or pining Love shall waste their youth,

Or Jealousy with rankling tooth,
That inly^o gnaws the secret heart,
And Envy wan, and faded Care,
Grim-visaged comfortless Despair,
And Sorrow's piercing dart.

inwardly

Ambition this shall tempt to rise,
Then whirl the wretch from high,
To bitter Scorn a sacrifice,
And grinning Infamy.
The stings of Falsehood those shall try,
And hard Unkindness' altered eye,
That mocks the tear it forced to flow;
And keen Remorse with blood defiled,
And moody Madness laughing wild
Amid severest woe.

Lo, in the vale of years beneath
A grisly troop are seen,
The painful family of Death,
More hideous than their Queen:
This racks the joints, this fires the veins,
That every lab'ring sinew strains,
Those in the deeper vitals rage:
Lo, Poverty, to fill the band,
That numbs the soul with icy hand,
And slow-consuming Age.

vigorous

To each his suff'rings: all are men,
Condemned alike to groan;
The tender for another's pain,
Th' unfeeling for his own.
Yet ah! why should they know their fate?
Since sorrow never comes too late,
And happiness too swiftly flies.
Thought would destroy their paradise.
No more; where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise.

—1747

*Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat,
Drowned in a Tub of Gold Fishes*¹

'Twas on a lofty vase's side,
Where China's gayest art had dyed
The azure flow'rs, that blow;^o
Demurest of the tabby kind,
5 The pensive Selima reclined,
Gazed on the lake below.

Her conscious tail her joy declared;
The fair round face, the snowy beard,
The velvet of her paws,
10 Her coat that with the tortoise vies,
Her ears of jet and emerald eyes,
She saw; and purred applause.

Still had she gazed; but 'midst the tide
Two angel forms were seen to glide,
15 The genii of the stream:
Their scaly armour's Tyrian² hue
Through richest purple to the view
Betrayed a golden gleam.

The hapless nymph with wonder saw:
20 A whisker first and then a claw,
With many an ardent wish,
She stretched in vain to reach the prize.
What female heart can gold despise?
What cat's averse to fish?

Presumptuous maid! with looks intent
25 Again she stretched, again she bent,
Nor knew the gulf between.
(Malignant Fate sat by and smiled)
The slipp'ry verge her feet beguiled, 30 She tumbled headlong in.

bloom

Eight times emerging from the flood
She mewed to every wat'ry god,
Some speedy aid to send.
No dolphin came, no Nereid³ stirred:
35 Nor cruel Tom nor Susan⁴ heard.
A fav'rite has no friend!

From hence, ye beauties, undeceived,
Know, one false step is ne'er retrieved,
And be with caution bold.
40 Not all that tempts your wand'ring eyes
And heedless hearts is lawful prize;
Nor all that glisters⁵ gold.
—1748

*Sonnet on the Death of Mr. Richard West*⁶

In vain to me the smiling Mornings shine,
And reddening Phoebus⁷ lifts his golden fire,
The birds in vain their amorous descant join,
Or cheerful fields resume their green attire;
5 These ears, alas! for other notes repine,^o long for
A different object do these eyes require;
My lonely anguish melts no heart but mine;
And in my breast the imperfect joys expire.
Yet Morning smiles the busy race to cheer,
10 And new-born pleasure brings to happier men,
The fields to all their wonted^o tribute bear; usual
To warm their little loves the birds complain;
I fruitless mourn to him that cannot hear,
And weep the more because I weep in vain.
—1775 (WRITTEN 1742)

¹ Ode ... Fishes Written on Horace Walpole's request, after Selima, one of his cats, drowned in a blue-and-white oriental china cistern.

² Tyrian Purple or crimson, as in the dye made from mollusks in the ancient city of Tyre.

³ dolphin In mythology, rescuer of the bard Arion; Nereid Sea nymph, daughter of Nereus the sea god.

Tom ... Susan Servants.

⁵ glisters Glitters, glistens. Cf. Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice 2.7.65.

⁶ Richard West Friend of Gray's who died suddenly in 1742 at age 25. Gray and West had been friends since they were boys at Eton College. The text of this poem is that of the 1742 manuscript copy.

⁷ Phoebus By-name for Apollo, who is often referred to poetically as the sun god.

Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard

The curfew tolls the knell¹ of parting day,
 The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,²
 The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
 And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

Now fades the glimm'ring landscape on the sight,
 And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
 Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
 And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds;

Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tow'r
 The moping owl does to the moon complain
 Of such as, wand'ring near her secret bow'r,
 Molest her ancient solitary reign.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew-tree's shade,
 Where heaves the turf in many a mould'ring heap,
 Each in his narrow cell for ever laid,
 The rude^o forefathers of the hamlet sleep. unlearned

The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
 The swallow twitt'ring from the straw-built shed,
 The cock's shrill clarion or the echoing horn,
 No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
 Or busy housewife ply her evening care:
 No children run to lisp their sire's return,
 Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
 Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe^o has broke; soil
 How jocund^o did they drive their team afield! merrily
 How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!

Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
 Their homely joys, and destiny obscure;

Nor Grandeur hear, with a disdainful smile,
 The short and simple annals of the poor.

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of pow'r,
 And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
 35 Awaits alike th' inevitable hour.
 The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Nor you, ye Proud, impute to these the fault,
 If Mem'ry o'er their tomb no trophies raise,
 Where through the long-drawn aisle and fretted³ vault
 40 The pealing anthem swells the note of praise.

Can storied urn or animated bust
 Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
 Can Honour's voice provoke the silent dust,
 Or Flatt'ry soothe the dull cold ear of Death?

Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
 45 Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
 Hands that the rod of empire might have swayed,
 Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre.

But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
 50 Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll;
 Chill Penury repressed their noble rage,⁴
 And froze the genial current of the soul.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
 The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear:
 55 Full many a flow'r is born to blush unseen
 And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

Some village-Hampden⁵ that with dauntless breast
 The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
 Some mute inglorious Milton⁶ here may rest,
 60 Some Cromwell⁷ guiltless of his country's blood.

¹ curfew Carved with decorative patterns.

rage Ardor, enthusiasm.

² Hampden John Hampden (1594–1643), member of Parliament who defied Charles I and died early in the ensuing civil war.

³ Milton John Milton (1608–74), English poet, dramatist.

⁴ Cromwell Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), Commander-in-Chief and then Lord Protector of England during the republican or commonwealth period (1649–60).

¹ curfew From the French for “cover your fire,” a medieval regulation that decreed that at an appointed hour (indicated by the ringing of a bell) all fires had to be covered and houses shut up for the night. The practice of ringing a bell at a certain hour of the evening (usually eight o'clock) persists in many towns; knell Sound made by a bell, especially one struck after a death.

² lea Meadow or area of grassland.

Th' applause of list'ning senates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their hist'ry in a nation's eyes,

66 Their lot forbade: nor circumscribed alone
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confined;
Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
And shut the gates of mercy on mankind,

70 The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame,
Or heap the shrine of Luxury and Pride
With incense kindled at the Muse's flame.¹

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
Along the cool sequestered vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

Yet ev'n these bones from insult to protect
Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture decked,
80 Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.

Their name, their years, spelt by th' unlettered muse,
The place of fame and elegy supply:
And many a holy text around she strews,
That teach the rustic moralist to die.

¹ With ... flame After this line, the earliest extant draft of the poem contains four stanzas that appear to be an earlier ending to the poem:

The thoughtless World to Majesty may bow
Exalt the brave, and idolize Success
But more to Innocence their Safety owe
Than Power and Genius e'er conspired to bless

And thou, who mindful of the unhonour'd Dead
Dost in these Notes their artless Tale relate
By Night and lonely Contemplation led
To linger in the gloomy Walks of Fate

Hark how the sacred Calm, that broods around
Bids ev'ry fierce tumultuous Passion cease
In still small Accents whisp'ring from the Ground
A grateful Earnest of eternal Peace

No more with Reason and thyself at strife:
Give anxious Cares and endless Wishes room
But thro' the cool sequester'd Vale of Life
Pursue the silent Tenor of thy Doom.

85 For who to dumb Forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing anxious being e'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing ling'ring look behind?

On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
90 Some pious drops the closing eye requires;
Ev'n from the tomb the voice of nature cries,
Ev'n in our ashes live their wonted fires.

For thee who, mindful of th' unhonoured dead,
Dost in these lines their artless tale relate;
95 If chance, by lonely Contemplation led,
Some kindred spirit shall inquire thy fate,

Haply some hoary-headed swain may say,
"Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
Brushing with hasty steps the dews away
100 To meet the sun upon the upland lawn.

"There at the foot of yonder nodding beech
That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
And pore upon the brook that babbles by.

105 "Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn,
Mutt'ring his wayward fancies he would rove,
Now drooping, woeful wan, like one forlorn,
Or crazed with care, or crossed in hopeless love.

"One morn I missed him on the custom'd hill,
110 Along the heath and near his fav'rite tree;
Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;

"The next with dirges due in sad array
Slow through the church-way path we saw him borne.
Approach and read (for thou can'st read) the lay,
Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn."

THE EPITAPH

*Here rests his head upon the lap of earth
A youth to fortune and to fame unknown.
Fair Science^o frowned not on his humble birth, learning
120 And Melancholy marked him for her own.*

*Large was his bounty and his soul sincere,
 Heav'n did a recompense as largely send:
 He gave to Mis'ry all he had, a tear,
 He gained from Heav'n ('twas all he wished) a friend.*

125 *No farther seek his merits to disclose,
 Or draw his frailties from their dread abode,
 (There they alike in trembling hope repose)
 The bosom of his Father and his God.*

—1751

CHRISTOPHER SMART

1722 – 1771

Christopher Smart produced several works of highly original poetry in the late 1750s and early 1760s. He also spent five of those years in a lunatic asylum, and much of the critical attention paid to Smart has centered on debates over the nature of his madness and the extent of its effect on his work. Whatever Smart's state, however, the poems themselves—particularly Jubilate Agno and A Song to David—have generally been recognized as boldly experimental and extremely influential. They have served as models for a variety of modern writers, including Anne Sexton, Alan Ginsberg, Edith Sitwell, Benjamin Britten, and Eli Mandel.

The son of a steward, Smart was born on 11 April 1722 at Shipbourne, Kent. He was educated at Cambridge, where he distinguished himself for his heavy drinking and inability to manage money (his friends once had to bail him out of debtors' prison), as well as for his academic excellence and prize-winning poetry.

Smart gave up a potential career at Cambridge to seek fame as a poet in London. There he made a living as a hack writer, contributing occasional pieces to various journals. He and the publisher John Newbery (whose step-daughter, Anna Maria Carnan, Smart married in 1753) started the journal The Midwife: or the Old Woman's Magazine, in which Smart wrote miscellaneous jokes, puns, and satirical pieces as the vastly popular Mary Midnight.

In 1756 Smart began to be overwhelmed by irrepressibly strong religious convictions. He would fall upon his knees and pray whenever the urge came upon him—in St. James's Park, in the Mall, in the streets—and oblige his friends to join him, often dragging them away from their dinners or out of their beds to do so. In 1757 Smart's family placed him in the London madhouse St. Luke's Hospital, where he was pronounced incurable. He was confined for most of the following six years.

Smart's most productive period occurred following his release in 1763. He completed many of the poems he had begun while confined, including his renowned A Song to David (1763), generally judged to be his greatest poem, and Translations of the Psalms of David (1765). Smart also translated the complete works of Horace into verse (a translation that remains highly regarded today). Tainted by his reputation as a madman, however, he was rarely taken seriously as a poet. In 1770 his debts caught up with him, and he was imprisoned in the King's Bench Prison. There he wrote his final poems, Hymns for the Amusement of Children, and remained until his death in 1771.

The surviving fragments of Smart's poem Jubilate Agno (Rejoice in the Lamb) were not printed until 1939, and these survived only because friends of the poet William Cowper had kept the manuscript, hoping to use it to better understand Cowper's own mental illness. Smart wrote Jubilate Agno, his ecstatic celebration of the omnipresence of the Divine Being, a few lines a day over a period of four years (1759–63) of confinement in the madhouse. As something of a journal of praise, it provides insight into his daily activities there. But in its experiments in poetic techniques it also moves toward an entirely new form of poetry. Like A Song to David, Jubilate Agno rejects the influences of Milton, Dryden, and Pope that had been evident in Smart's earlier poetry. Instead, with its alternating sections of lines beginning with “Let” and “For,” it appears to draw on traditional Hebrew poetry, and resembles response readings such as those found in the Psalter, the Litany, and other texts in the Book of Common Prayer.

Although the story of Smart’s life of confinement and death in prison is an unhappy one, his poetry is infused with an irrepressible sense of joy. In the most famous section of Jubilate Agno, “My Cat Jeoffry,” Smart lovingly praises his cat, his sole companion in confinement. With witty wordplay and obscure scholarly references, Smart celebrates Jeoffry both as a source of comfort and love and as one of God’s creatures, proof of his divine plan.

from Jubilate Agno
[MY CAT JEOFFRY]

For I will consider my Cat Jeoffry.
For he is the servant of the Living God duly and daily serving him.
For at the first glance of the glory of God in the East¹
he worships in his way.
For is this done by wreathing his body seven times round with elegant quickness.
For then he leaps up to catch the musk, which is the blessing of God upon his prayer.
For he rolls upon prank² to work it in.
For having done duty and received blessing he begins to consider himself.
For this he performs in ten degrees.
For first he looks upon his forepaws to see if they are clean.
For secondly he kicks up behind to clear away there.
For thirdly he works it upon stretch with the forepaws extended.
For fourthly he sharpens his paws by wood.
For fifthly he washes himself.
For Sixthly he rolls upon wash.
For Seventhly he fleas himself, that he may not be interrupted upon the beat.
For Eighthly he rubs himself against a post.
For Ninthly he looks up for his instructions.
For Tenthly he goes in quest of food.
For having considered God and himself he will consider his neighbor.

- 20 For if he meets another cat he will kiss her in kindness.
For when he takes his prey he plays with it to give it a chance.
For one mouse in seven escapes by his dallying.
For when his day’s work is done his business more properly begins.
For he keeps the Lord’s watch in the night against the adversary.
25 For he counteracts the powers of darkness by his electrical skin³ & glaring eyes.
For he counteracts the Devil, who is death, by brisking about⁴ the life.
For in his morning orisons he loves the sun and the sun loves him.
For he is of the tribe of Tiger.
For the Cherub Cat is a term of the Angel Tiger.⁵
30 For he has the subtlety and hissing of a serpent, which in goodness he suppresses.
For he will not do destruction if he is well fed, neither will he spit without provocation.
For he purrs in thankfulness, when God tells him he’s a good Cat.
For he is an instrument for the children to learn benevolence upon.
For every house is incomplete without him & a blessing is lacking in the spirit.
35 For the Lord commanded Moses concerning the cats at ¹ electrical skin An article in The Gentleman’s Magazine 24 (1754) stated that cats have a natural electricity greater than that of any other animal.

² brisking about Moving about briskly.

³ Cherub ... Tiger Smart is referring to the fact that a cherub is a small angel, as a cat is a small tiger.

¹ glory ... East Sunrise.

² upon prank For a frolic; for a trick.

the departure of the Children of Israel from Egypt.¹
 For every family had one cat at least in the bag,
 For the English Cats are the best in Europe.
 For he is the cleanest in the use of his forepaws of any quadruped.
 For the dexterity of his defence is an instance of the love of God to him exceedingly.
 40 For he is the quickest to his mark of any creature.
 For he is tenacious of his point.
 For he is a mixture of gravity and waggery.²
 For he knows that God is his Saviour.
 For there is nothing sweeter than his peace when at rest.
 45 For there is nothing brisker than his life when in motion.
 For he is of the Lord's poor and so indeed is he called by benevolence perpetually—Poor Jeoffry! poor
 Jeoffry! the rat has bit thy throat.
 For I bless the name of the Lord Jesus that Jeoffry is better.
 For the divine spirit comes about his body to sustain it in compleat^o cat. complete
 For his tongue is exceeding pure so that it has in purity what it wants in music.
 50 For he is docile and can learn certain things.
 For he can set up with gravity, which is patience upon approbation.
 For he can fetch and carry, which is patience in employment.
 For he can jump over a stick, which is patience upon proof positive.
 For he can spraggle^o upon waggle³ at the word sprawl
 of command.
 55 For he can jump from an eminence into his master's bosom.

For he can catch the cork and toss it again.
 For he is hated by the hypocrite and miser.
 For the former is afraid of detection.
 For the latter refuses the charge.
 60 For he camels his back to bear the first notion of business.
 For he is good to think on, if a man would express himself neatly.
 For he made a great figure in Egypt for his signal services.
 For he killed the Ichneumon-rat⁴ very pernicious by land.
 For his ears are so acute that they sting again.⁵
 65 For from this proceeds the passing quickness of his attention.
 For by stroking of him I have found out electricity.
 For I perceived God's light about him both wax and fire.
 For the Electrical fire is the spiritual substance, which God sends from heaven to sustain the bodies both of man and beast.
 For God has blessed him in the variety of his movements.
 70 For, though he cannot fly, he is an excellent clamberer.
 For his motions upon the face of the earth are more than any other quadruped.
 For he can tread to all the measures upon the music.
 For he can swim for life.
 For he can creep.
 —1939 (WRITTEN 1759–63)

¹ Lord ... Egypt The Lord commanded the children of Israel to take their flocks and herds with them upon departure (Exodus 13.32).

² waggery Mischievous jocularly.

³ upon waggle While wiggling about.

⁴ Ichneumon-rat Mongoose-like carnivorous mammal domesticated and revered by the ancient Egyptians for its ability to find and destroy the eggs of crocodiles and other dangerous reptiles.

⁵ again In response.

TRANSATLANTIC CURRENTS

CONTEXTS

British and New World literatures have tended for centuries to be studied and taught in isolation from each other. Recently, however, both scholarship and pedagogy have begun to focus more frequently on the connections between Britain, Africa, and the Americas. There are of course necessary cultural distinctions to be made between, for instance, a tropical plantation, a barely established North American frontier settlement, and the fully developed urban bustle of London—but there are also connections to be acknowledged, as the flow of economic goods, people, and ideas across the sea in multiple directions influenced the development of literature in English on all shores of the Atlantic.

The slave trade was essential to the continued interchange; British merchants had become heavily engaged in the trade halfway through the seventeenth century, and their involvement continued to grow past the end of the eighteenth century. The trade operated in a loosely triangular form: ships transported manufactured goods from Europe to Africa to exchange for slaves; the slaves were brought to the Caribbean, where they were forced to engage in the production of luxury commodities such as sugar and tobacco; these products were then brought back to Europe for sale. The British colonies in North America also purchased slaves from Africa and traded with the Caribbean, exporting wood and food and importing luxury goods. Demand for slaves prompted the transportation of vast numbers of people: in the eighteenth century alone, about 6,500,000 slaves were traded, of whom an estimated 2,500,000 were shipped by British traders. This exchange created extraordinary economic growth for Britain and its colonies. And, in the latter half of the eighteenth century, the traffic of goods and people spawned intellectual and literary connections as authors, political campaigners, and theologians expressed their moral outrage over Britain's role in the slave trade and the treatment of slaves in British colonies.¹ As a result of growing opposition, the British slave trade would be outlawed in 1807, and all slaves in Britain and its colonies would be legally freed in 1834. (Anti-slavery laws were passed slightly earlier in Upper and Lower Canada and in some northern American states, with other states gradually following suit until official nationwide emancipation was achieved in 1865.)

While Africans were brought to the Americas by force, others came freely from England, Scotland, and Ireland. In rural areas, high rents and failing industry, combined with the promise of relatively cheap land and well-paid employment in the Americas, encouraged those who could afford the cost of travel to leave their homes behind—bringing to North America their families, their cultural influence, and their agricultural skills. Migrants from urban centers were more likely to travel individually; most of these were tradespeople or unskilled young men with few prospects at home. Although the English language and a blend of English, Scottish, and Irish culture dominated in the colonies, there were also regions with high concentrations of German, Dutch, and other settlers from continental Europe.

With settlement came conflict, both old and new. From the late seventeenth century to the 1760s, France and Britain engaged in a series of four wars, and their North American possessions fought each other whenever the colonial powers did. England's self-image was deeply invested in the outcomes of its overseas battles; a mythology grew up around the death of General Wolfe, for example, in the wake of his defeat of French forces at Quebec, a moment which came to be seen as emblematic of the empire's glory. Pre-existing European conflicts blended with the conflicts of the New World. Colonists attempted to displace native people from useful land but also wanted to take advantage of the trade opportunities and military strength that alliances with tribes could afford.¹ The intercolonial wars of this period in North America are often called the French and Indian Wars, a somewhat misleading name, given that Native people participated on both sides. Greater numbers allied with the French in the hope of preventing further British expansion, but their hopes were disappointed when the French, in negotiating peace with Britain in 1763, ceded these tribes' territories without consulting them. Throughout the eighteenth century relations between colonists and Native people continued to be strained; while treaties were sometimes negotiated and alliances sometimes honored, that was far from the norm. Tribes often defended themselves with violence—both alongside their colonial allies and independently during times of peace between the colonies.

¹ See the Contexts section “The Abolition of Slavery” available in the anthology’s online component, for more material on the British anti-slavery movement.

As the eighteenth century progressed and the Thirteen Colonies became more self-sufficient economically, they began as well to develop a more distinct sense of political identity. In the last half of the century, when the British government imposed a series of taxes and other legislation on the colonists without consulting local government in the Colonies, American dissenters responded with a cry of "no taxation without representation." Their argument was that, as Englishmen, they had a right to participate in the decisions of the British Parliament. This disagreement also created turmoil on the opposite side of the Atlantic, with the British pressed to define their political identity as an imperial power. In England, those defending the authority of the crown outnumbered those advocating concessions to the Colonies; although the British were forced to repeal the Stamp Act (the most controversial piece of legislation), they passed the Declaratory Act, a statement of their right to make law for the Colonies unilaterally. Opposition in the Colonies intensified, the British government passed increasingly invasive legislation, and the hostilities escalated into armed conflict; the Revolutionary War, which began in 1775, ended officially with American independence in 1783.

This did not, of course, end North America's relationship with Great Britain. The colonies of British North America (the eastern part of present-day Canada) still belonged to the empire, which continued to expand its territory to the west. And even the newly-formed United States of America remained far more closely tied to Britain, both economically and culturally, than to any other nation.

¹ See Samuel Johnson's imagining of a native perspective on colonization in The Idler No. 81 elsewhere in this anthology.

Slavery

from Richard Ligon, A True & Exact History of the Island of Barbados (1657)

In 1647, Richard Ligon found himself without money or opportunity in England and traveled to Barbados in the hope that his fortunes would change. They did not; a fever prompted his return to England in 1650, and he was thrown into debtors' prison shortly after his arrival home. His descriptions of life in Barbados shed valuable light on the early development of slavery in Britain's colonies—and on the development of the racist ideology that supported the institution.

The island is divided into three sorts of men, *viz.*¹ masters, servants, and slaves. The slaves and their posterity, being subject to their masters forever, are kept and preserved with greater care than the servants, who are theirs but for five years,² according to the law of the island. . . .

It has been accounted a strange thing that the negroes, being more than double the numbers of the Christians that are there—and they accounted a bloody people, where they think they have power or advantages, and the more bloody by how much they are more fearful than others—that these should not commit some horrid massacre upon the Christians, thereby to enfranchise³ themselves, and become masters of the island. But there are three reasons that take away this wonder; the one is, they are not suffered to touch or handle any weapons; the other, that they are held in such awe and slavery as they are fearful to appear in any daring act; and seeing the mustering of our men and hearing their gunshot (that which nothing is more terrible to them), their spirits are subjugated to so low a condition as they dare not look up to any bold attempt. Besides these, there is a third reason, which stops all designs of that kind, and that is, they are fetched from several parts of Africa, who speak several languages, and by that means one of them understands not another: for some of them are fetched from Guinny and Binny, some from Cutchew, some from Angola, and some from the River of Gambra.⁴ And in some of these places where petty kingdoms are, they sell their subjects and such as they take in battle, whom they make slaves; and some mean men sell their servants, their children, and sometimes their wives; and think all good traffic⁵ for such commodities as our merchants send them.

When they are brought to us, the planters buy them out of the ship, where they find them stark naked, and therefore cannot be deceived in any outward infirmity. They choose them as they do horses in a market; the strongest, youthfulest, and most beautiful yield the greatest prices. Thirty pound sterling is a price for the best man negro; and twenty-five, twenty-six, or twenty-seven pound for a woman; the children are at easier rates. And we buy them so as the sexes may be equal; for, if they have more men than women, the men who are unmarried will come to their masters and complain that they cannot live without wives, and desire him,⁶ they may have wives. And he tells them that the next ship that comes, he will buy them wives, which satisfies them for the present; and so they expect the good time: which the master performing with them, the bravest fellow is to choose first, and so in order, as they are in place; and every one of them knows his better, and gives him the precedence, as cows do one another in passing through a narrow gate; for the most of them are as near beasts as may be, setting their souls aside. Religion they know none; yet most of them acknowledge a God, as appears by their motion and gestures: for, if one of them do another wrong, and he cannot revenge himself, he looks up to heaven for vengeance and holds up both his hands, as if the power must come from thence, that must do him right. Chaste they are as any people under

¹ viz. Abbreviation of the Latin videlicet, meaning “namely.”

² the servants ... five years At this time, it was a common practice for people to contract themselves as indentured servants, legally committing to a set number of years of unpaid labor, in exchange for passage to the Americas.

³ enfranchise Free.

⁴ Guinny ... Gambra Places ranging along much of Africa's west coast, including Guinea, Benin, the Gambia River, and Cacheu (in present day Guinea-Bissau).

⁵ good traffic Reasonable trade.

⁶ desire him I.e., request of him that.

the sun; for, when the men and women are together naked, they never cast their eyes towards the parts that ought to be covered; and those amongst us that have breeches and petticoats, I never saw so much as a kiss, or embrace, or a wanton glance with their eyes between them. Jealous they are of their wives, and hold it for a great injury and scorn if another man make the least courtship to his wife. . . .

[While I was using a compass] this negro Sambo comes to me, and seeing the needle wag, desired to know the reason of its stirring, and whether it were alive: I told him no, but it stood upon a point, and for a while it would stir, but by and by stand still, which he observed and found it to be true. The next question was why it stood one way and would not remove to any other point. I told him that it would stand no way but north and south, and upon that showed him the four cardinal points of the compass, east, west, north, south, which he presently learnt by heart and promised me never to forget it. His last question was why it would stand north. I gave this reason, because of the huge rocks of loadstone that were in the north part of the world, which had a quality to draw iron to it; and this needle, being of iron touched with a loadstone, it would always stand that way.

This point of philosophy was a little too hard for him, and so he stood in a strange muse;¹ which to put him out of, I bade him reach his axe and put it near to the compass, and remove it about; and, as he did so, the needle turned with it, which put him in the greatest admiration that ever I saw a man, and so quite gave over his questions, and desired me² that he might be made a Christian; for he thought to be a Christian was to be endued with all those knowledges he wanted.

I promised to do my best endeavour; and when I came home, spoke to the master of the plantation, and told him that poor Sambo desired much to be a Christian. But his answer was that the people of that island were governed by the laws of England, and by those laws we could not make a Christian a slave. I told him my request was far different from that, for I desired him to make a slave a Christian. His answer was that it was true, there was a great difference in that; but, being once a Christian, he could no more account him a slave, and so lose the hold they had of them as slaves by making them Christians; and by that means should open such a gap as all the planters in the island would curse him. So I was struck mute, and poor Sambo kept out of the Church; as ingenious, as honest, and as good a natured poor soul, as ever wore black, or ate green. . . .

Though there be a mark set upon these people which will hardly ever be wiped off, as of their cruelties when they have advantages, and of their fearfulness and falseness; yet no rule so general but hath his³ exception: for I believe, and I have strong motives to cause me to be of that persuasion, that there are as honest, faithful, and conscionable people amongst them as amongst those of Europe or any other part of the world. . . .

from John Woolman, "Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes" (1754)

One of the first prominent Quakers to publicly oppose slavery, John Woolman was influential in increasing anti-slavery sentiment among Quakers, who came to play a significant role in the abolition movement. Born in New Jersey, he traveled to preach in the colonies and eventually in England. He abstained from using sugar, dyed clothing, and other products of slave labor.

"Forasmuch as ye did it to the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

—Matthew 25.40

As many times there are different motives to the same action, and one does that from a generous heart which another does for selfish ends; the like may be said in this case.

There are various circumstances among those that keep negroes, and different ways by which they fall under their care; and I doubt not, there are many well disposed persons amongst them who desire rather to manage wisely and justly in this difficult matter, than to make gain of it.

muse Act of reflection or musing.

² desired me Requested of me.

³ his Its.

But the general disadvantage which these poor negroes lie under in an enlightened Christian country having often filled me with real sadness, I now think it my duty, through Divine aid, to offer some thoughts thereon to the consideration of others.

When we remember that all nations are of one blood, (Gen. 3.20)¹ that in this world we are but sojourners, that we are subject to the like afflictions and infirmities of body, the like disorders and frailties in mind, the like temptations, the same death, and the same judgment, and that the all-wise Being is Judge and Lord over us all, it seems to raise an idea of general brotherhood, and a disposition easy to be touched with a feeling of each other's afflictions; but when we forget those things, and look chiefly at our outward circumstances, in this and some ages past, constantly retaining in our minds the distinction between us and them, with respect to our knowledge and improvement in things Divine, natural and artificial, our breasts being apt to be filled with fond notions of superiority, there is danger of erring in our conduct toward them.

We allow them to be of the same species with ourselves; odds is, we are in a higher station, and enjoy greater favour than they. And when it is thus that our heavenly Father endoweth some of his children with distinguished gifts, they are intended for good ends; but if those thus gifted are thereby lifted up above their brethren, not considering themselves as debtors to the weak, nor behaving themselves as faithful stewards, none who judge impartially can suppose them free from ingratitude.

When a people dwell under the liberal distribution of favours from heaven, it behooves them carefully to inspect their ways, and consider the purposes for which those favours are bestowed, lest, through forgetfulness of God and misusing his gifts, they incur his heavy displeasure, whose judgments are just and equal, who exalteth and humbleth to the dust, as he seeth meet....

To prevent such an error, let us calmly consider their circumstance; and the better to do it, make their case ours. Suppose then that our ancestors and we had been exposed to constant servitude, in the more servile and inferior employments of life; that we had been destitute of the help of reading and good company; that amongst ourselves we had had but few wise and pious instructors; that the religious amongst our superiors seldom took notice of us; that while others in ease had plentifully heaped up the fruit of our labour, we had received barely enough to relieve nature; and being wholly at the command of others, had generally been treated as a contemptible, ignorant part of mankind; should we, in that case, be less abject than they now are? Again, if oppression be so hard to bear that a wise man is made mad by it, Eccl. 7.7,² then a series of oppressions, altering the behaviour and manners of a people is what may reasonably be expected.

When our property is taken contrary to our mind, by means appearing to us unjust, it is only through Divine influence, and the enlargement of heart from thence proceeding, that we can love our reputed oppressors. If the negroes fall short in this, an uneasy, if not a disconsolate disposition will be awakened, and remain like seeds in their minds, producing sloth and other habits which appear odious to us; and with which, had they been free men, they would not perhaps have been chargeable. These and other circumstances, rightly considered, will lessen the too great disparity which some make between us and them.

Integrity of heart has appeared in some of them; so that if we continue in the word of Christ, and our conduct towards them be seasoned with his love, we may hope to see the good effect of it. This, in a good degree, is the case with some into whose hands they have fallen; but that too many treat them otherwise, not seeming conscious of any neglect, is, alas! too evident.

When self-love presides in our minds, our opinions are biased in our own favour; and in this condition, being concerned with a people so situated that they have no voice to plead their own cause, there is danger of using ourselves to an undisturbed partiality, until, by long custom, the mind becomes reconciled with it, and the judgment itself infected....

"[Christ] hath laid down the best criterion by which mankind ought to judge of their own conduct, and others judge for them of theirs, one towards another,

¹ Gen. 3.20 "And Adam called his wife's name Eve, because she was the mother of all living."

² Eccl. 7.7 "Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad; and a gift destroyeth the heart."

*viz.*¹ 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them.'² I take it that all men by nature are equally entitled to the equity of this rule, and under the indispensable obligations of it. One man ought not to look upon another man or society of men as so far beneath him that he should not put himself in their place, in all his actions towards them, and bring all to this test, viz. How should I approve of this conduct, were I in their circumstance, and they in mine?"³...

It may be objected that there is the cost of purchase, and risk of their lives to them who possess [slaves], and therefore it is needful that they make the best use of their time. In a practice just and reasonable, such objections may have weight; but if the work be wrong from the beginning, there is little or no force in them. If I purchase a man who has never forfeited his liberty, the natural right of freedom is in him; and shall I keep him and his posterity in servitude and ignorance? "How should I approve of this conduct, were I in his circumstances, and he in mine?"...

If we, by the operation of the Spirit of Christ, become heirs with him in the kingdom of his Father and are redeemed from the alluring counterfeit joys of this world, and the joy of Christ remain in us; to suppose that one in this happy condition can, for the sake of earthly riches, not only deprive his fellow-creatures of the sweetness of freedom, which, rightly used, is one of the greatest temporal blessings, but therewith neglect using proper means for their acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures and the advantage of true religion, seems at least a contradiction to reason....

To conclude, it is a great truth most certain that a life guided by wisdom from above, agreeably with justice, equity and mercy, is throughout consistent and amiable, and truly beneficial to society; the serenity and calmness of mind in it affords an unparalleled comfort in this life, and the end of it is blessed.

And it is no less true that they who in the midst of high favours remain ungrateful, and under all the advantages that a Christian can desire are selfish, earthly and sensual, do miss the true fountain of happiness and wander in a maze of dark anxiety, where all their treasures are insufficient to quiet their minds: hence, from an insatiable craving, they neglect doing good with what they have acquired, and too often add oppression to vanity, that they may compass⁴ more.

Hannah More, "Slavery: A Poem" (1788)

Hannah More was already a very successful playwright when she became involved with England's circle of prominent abolitionist campaigners. Composed at the request of the Society for the Abolition of the Slave Trade in support of a parliamentary debate on the subject, "Slavery: A Poem" was widely circulated by anti-slavery committees.

If heaven has into being deigned to call
Thy light, O LIBERTY! to shine on all;
Bright intellectual sun! why does thy ray
To earth distribute only partial day?
5 Since no resisting cause from spirit flows
Thy penetrating essence to oppose;
No obstacles by nature's hand imprest,
Thy subtle and ethereal beams arrest;
Nor motion's laws can speed thy active course,
10 Nor strong repulsion's pow'rs obstruct thy force;
Since there is no convexity in MIND,⁵
Why are thy genial beams to parts confined?
While the chill North with thy bright ray is blest,
Why should fell darkness half the South invest?
15 Was it decreed, fair freedom! at thy birth,
That thou should'st ne'er irradiate°
all the earth?
While Britain basks in thy full blaze of light,
Why lies sad Afric quenched in total night?
Thee only, sober Goddess! I attest,
20 In smiles chastised, and decent graces drest.
Not that unlicensed monster of the crowd,
Whose roar terrific bursts in peals so loud,

¹ viz. Abbreviation of the Latin videlicet, meaning "namely," or "that is to say."

² Whatsoever ye ... to them See Matthew 7.12.

³ [Christ] hath ... they in mine? From Quaker writer Alexander Arscott's treatise Some Considerations Relating to the Present State of the Christian Religion, Part Third (1734).

⁴ compass Attain.

⁵ Since there ... in MIND Since the realm of thought is not curved like the earth.

Deaf'ning the ear of peace: fierce faction's tool;
 Of rash sedition born, and mad misrule;
 Whose stubborn mouth, rejecting reason's rein,
 No strength can govern, and no skill restrain;
 Whose magic cries the frantic vulgar draw
 To spurn at order, and to outrage law;
 To tread on grave authority and pow'r,
 And shake the work of ages in an hour:
 Convulsed^o her voice, and pestilent her breath, agitated
 She raves of mercy, while she deals out death:
 Each blast is fate; she darts from either hand
 Red conflagration^o o'er th'astonished land; inferno
 Clamouring for peace, she rends the air with noise,
 And to reform a part, the whole destroys.

O, plaintive Southerne!¹ whose impassioned strain
 So oft has waked my languid Muse in vain!
 Now, when congenial^o themes her cares engage, similar
 She burns to emulate thy glowing page;
 Her failing efforts mock her fond^o desires, foolish
 She shares thy feelings, not partakes thy fires.
 Strange pow'r of song! the strain that warms the heart
 Seems the same inspiration to impart;
 Touched by the kindling energy alone,
 We think the flame which melts us is our own;
 Deceived, for genius we mistake delight,
 Charmed as we read, we fancy we can write.

Though not to me, sweet bard, thy pow'rs belong
 Fair Truth, a hallowed guide! inspires my song.
 Here Art would weave her gayest flow'rs in vain,
 For Truth the bright invention would disdain.
 For no fictitious ills these numbers flow,
 But living anguish, and substantial woe;
 No individual griefs my bosom melt,
 For millions feel what Oronoko felt:
 Fired by no single wrongs, the countless host
 I mourn, by rapine^o dragged from Afric's coast. plunder
 Perish th'illiberal thought which would debase
 The native genius of the sable^o race! dark
 Perish the proud philosophy, which sought
 To rob them of the pow'rs of equal thought!
 Does then th'immortal principle within

Change with the casual colour of a skin?

65 Does matter govern spirit? or is mind
 Degraded by the form to which 'tis joined?

No: they have heads to think, and hearts to feel,
 And souls to act, with firm, though erring, zeal;
 For they have keen affections, kind desires,
 70 Love strong as death, and active patriot fires;
 All the rude energy, the fervid flame,
 Of high-souled passion, and ingenuous shame:
 Strong, but luxuriant virtues boldly shoot
 From the wild vigour of a savage root.

Nor weak their sense of honour's proud control,
 For pride is virtue in a pagan soul;
 A sense of worth, a conscience of desert,^o deserving praise
 A high, unbroken haughtiness of heart:
 That self-same stuff which erst^o proud once
 empires swayed,

80 Of which the conquerors of the world were made.
 Capricious fate of man! that very pride
 In Afric scourged, in Rome was deified.

No muse, O Quashi!² shall thy deeds relate,
 No statue snatch thee from oblivious fate!
 85 For thou wast born where never gentle Muse
 On valour's grave the flow'rs of genius strews;
 And thou wast born where no recording page
 Plucks the fair deed from time's devouring rage.
 Had fortune placed thee on some happier coast,
 90 Where polished souls heroic virtue boast,
 To thee, who sought'st a voluntary grave,
 Th'uninjured honours of thy name to save,

² [More's note] It is a point of honour among negroes of high spirit to die rather than to suffer their glossy skin to bear the mark of the whip. Qua-shi had somehow offended his master, a young planter with whom he had been bred up in the endearing intimacy of a play-fellow. His services had been faithful; his attachment affectionate. The master resolved to punish him, and pursued him for that purpose. In trying to escape Qua-shi stumbled and fell; the master fell upon him; they wrestled long with doubtful victory; at length Qua-shi got uppermost, and, being firmly seated on his master's breast, he secured his legs with one hand, and with the other drew a sharp knife; then said, "Master, I have been bred up with you from a child; I have loved you as myself: in return, you have condemned me to a punishment of which I must ever have borne the marks: thus only can I avoid them"; so saying, he drew the knife with all his strength across his own throat, and fell down dead, without a groan, on his master's body. [More cites the source of this story as James Ramsay's Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies (1784).]

¹ [More's note] Author of the tragedy of Oronoko. [Aphra Behn wrote the original Oroonoko (1688), about an African prince who became a British slave, but Thomas Southerne's stage adaptation (1695) was better known.]

Whose generous arm thy barbarous master spared,
Altars had smoked, and temples had been reared.

95 Whene'er to Afric's shores I turn my eyes,
Horrors of deepest, deadliest guilt arise;
I see, by more than fancy's mirror shown,
The burning village, and the blazing town:
See the dire victim torn from social life,
100 The shrieking babe, the agonizing wife!
She, wretch forlorn! is dragged by hostile hands,
To distant tyrants sold, in distant lands!
Transmitted miseries, and successive chains,
The sole sad heritage her child obtains!
105 Ev'n this last wretched boon their foes deny,
To weep together, or together die.
By felon hands, by one relentless stroke,
See the fond links of feeling nature broke!
The fibres twisting round a parent's heart,
110 Torn from their grasp, and bleeding as they part.
Hold, murderers, hold! not aggravate distress;
Respect the passions you yourselves possess;
Ev'n you, of ruffian heart, and ruthless hand,
Love your own offspring, love your native land.
115 Ah! leave them holy Freedom's cheering smile,
The heav'n-taught fondness for the parent soil;
Revere affections mingled with our frame,
In every nature, every clime the same;
In all, these feelings equal sway maintain;
120 In all the love of HOME and FREEDOM reign:
And Tempe's vale, and parched Angola's¹ sand,
One equal fondness of their sons command.
Th'unconquered savage laughs at pain and toil,
Basking in freedom's beams which gild his native soil.

125 Does thirst of empire, does desire of fame,
(For these are specious crimes) our rage inflame?
No: sordid lust of gold their fate controls,
The basest appetite of basest souls;
Gold, better gained, by what their ripening sky,
130 Their fertile fields, their arts² and mines supply.

What wrongs, what injuries does oppression plead
To smooth the horror of th'unnatural deed?

Tempe's vale River valley in Greece; Angola Portuguese colony in sub-Saharan Africa.

² [More's note] Besides many valuable productions of the soil, cloths and carpets of exquisite manufacture are brought from the coast of Guinea.

What strange offence, what aggravated sin?
They stand convicted—of a darker skin!

135 Barbarians, hold! th'opprobrious³ disgraceful commerce spare,
Respect his sacred image which they bear:³
Though dark and savage, ignorant and blind,
They claim the common privilege of kind;
Let Malice strip them of each other plea,⁴
140 They still are men, and men should still be free.
Insulted Reason loaths th'inverted trade⁵—
Dire change! the agent is the purchase made!
Perplexed, the baffled Muse involves⁶ the tale; confuses
Nature confounded, well may language fail!
145 The outraged Goddess with abhorrent eyes
Sees MAN the traffic, SOULS the merchandise!
Plead not, in reason's palpable abuse,
Their sense of feeling callous and obtuse:⁶
From heads to hearts lies nature's plain appeal, 150 Though few can reason, all mankind can feel.
Though wit may boast a livelier dread of shame,
A loftier sense of wrong refinement claim;
Though polished manners may fresh wants invent,
And nice⁷ distinctions nicer souls torment; fine
155 Though these on finer spirits heavier fall,
Yet natural evils are the same to all.
Though wounds there are which reason's force may heal,
There needs no logic sure to make us feel.
The nerve, howe'er untutored, can sustain
160 A sharp, unutterable sense of pain;
As exquisitely fashioned in a slave,
As where unequal fate a sceptre⁷ gave.
Sense is as keen where Congo's⁸ sons preside,
As where proud Tiber⁹ rolls his classic tide.
165 Rhetoric or verse may point the feeling line,

³ Respect ... bear I.e., respect the fact that they are made in God's image.

⁴ each other plea Every other argument.

⁵ th'inverted trade The opposite trade; the use of white slaves by black people.

⁶ [More's note] Nothing is more frequent than this cruel and stupid argument, that they do not feel the miseries inflicted on them as Europeans would do.

⁷ sceptre Ornamental rod that is a symbol of royal authority.

⁸ Congo River in Central Africa.

⁹ Tiber River in Italy that passes through Rome.

They do not whet^o sensation, but define. sharpen
 Did ever slave less feel the galling^o chain, chafing
 When Zeno¹ proved there was no ill in pain?
 Their miseries philosophic quirks deride,
 Slaves groan in pangs disowned by Stoic pride.

When the fierce Sun darts vertical his beams,
 And thirst and hunger mix their wild extremes;
 When the sharp iron² wounds his inmost soul,
 And his strained eyes in burning anguish roll;
 Will the parched negro find, ere he expire,
 No pain in hunger, and no heat in fire?

For him, when fate his tortured frame destroys,
 What hope of present fame, or future joys?
 For this, have heroes shortened nature's date;
 For that, have martyrs gladly met their fate;
 But him, forlorn, no hero's pride sustains,
 No martyr's blissful visions soothe his pains;
 Sullen, he mingles with his kindred dust,
 For he has learned to dread the Christian's trust;
 To him what mercy can that pow'r display,
 Whose servants murder, and whose sons betray?
 Savage! thy venial^o error I deplore, excusable
 They are not Christians who infest thy shore.

O thou sad spirit, whose preposterous yoke
 The great deliverer death, at length, has broke!
 Released from misery, and escaped from care,
 Go meet that mercy man denied thee here.
 In thy dark home, sure refuge of th'oppressed,
 The wicked vex not, and the weary rest.
 And, if some notions, vague and undefined,
 Of future terrors have assailed thy mind;
 If such thy masters have presumed to teach,
 As terrors only they are prone to preach;
 (For should they paint eternal mercy's reign,
 Where were th'oppressor's rod, the captive's chain?)
 If, then, thy troubled soul has learned to dread
 The dark unknown thy trembling footsteps tread;
 On HIM, who made thee what thou art, depend;

¹ Zeno Zeno of Citum (334 BCE–262 BCE), founder of Stoicism, a philosophy asserting that a wise person can be happy under any circumstances.

² [More's note] This is not said figuratively. The writer of these lines has seen a complete set of chains, fitted to every separate limb of these unhappy, innocent men; together with instruments for wrenching open the jaws, contrived with such cruelty as would shock the humanity of an inquisitor.

HE, who withholds the means, accepts the end.
 Not thine the reckoning dire of LIGHT abused,
 KNOWLEDGE disgraced, and LIBERTY misused;
 On thee no awful judge incensed shall sit
 For parts perverted, and dishonoured wit.
 Where ignorance will be found the surest plea,
 How many learn'd and wise shall envy thee!

And thou, WHITE SAVAGE! whether lust of gold,
 Or lust of conquest, rule thee uncontrolled!
 Hero, or robber!—by whatever name
 Thou plead thy impious claim to wealth or fame;
 Whether inferior mischiefs be thy boast,
 A petty tyrant rifling Gambia's coast:
 Or bolder carnage track thy crimson way,
 Kings dispossessed, and provinces thy prey;
 Panting to tame wide earth's remotest bound;
 All Cortez³ murdered, all Columbus found;
 O'er plundered realms to reign, detested Lord,
 Make millions wretched, and thyself abhorred;—

In reason's eye, in wisdom's fair account,
 Your sum of glory boasts a like amount;
 The means may differ, but the end's the same;
 Conquest is pillage with a nobler name.
 Who makes the sum of human blessings less,
 Or sinks the stock of general happiness,
 No solid fame shall grace, no true renown,

His life shall blazon,^o or his memory crown. adorn

Had those advent'rous spirits who explore
 Through ocean's trackless wastes, the far-sought shore;
 Whether of wealth insatiate,^o or of pow'r, endlessly greedy
 Conquerors who waste, or ruffians who devour:
 Had these possessed, O COOK!⁴ thy gentle mind,
 Thy love of arts, thy love of humankind;
 Had these pursued thy mild and liberal plan,
 DISCOVERERS had not been a curse to man!
 Then, blessed philanthropy! thy social hands
 Had linked dis severed^o worlds in brothers' divided bands;

³ Cortez Hernán Cortés (1485–1547), a Spanish Conquistador whose expedition to Mexico resulted in the fall of the Aztec Empire.

⁴ COOK Captain James Cook (1728–79), British explorer and cartographer who mapped many places that were previously unknown to or uncharted by Europeans. Although his discoveries prompted further colonization, Cook himself was friendly and sympathetic toward the indigenous peoples of all the places he visited.

Careless, if colour, or if clime° divide; climate
 Then, loved, and loving, man had lived, and died.

The purest wreaths which hang on glory's shrine,
 For empires founded, peaceful PENN!¹ are thine;
 245 No blood-stained laurels² crowned thy virtuous toil,
 No slaughtered natives drenched thy fair-earned soil.
 Still thy meek spirit in thy flock³ survives,
 Consistent still, their doctrines rule their lives;
 Thy followers only have effaced the shame
 250 Inscribed by SLAVERY on the Christian name.

Shall Britain, where the soul of freedom reigns,
 Forge chains for others she herself disdains?
 Forbid it, Heaven! O let the nations know
 The liberty she loves she will bestow;
 255 Not to herself the glorious gift confined,
 She spreads the blessing wide as humankind;
 And, scorning narrow views of time and place,
 Bids all be free in earth's extended space.

What page of human annals can record
 260 A deed so bright as human rights restored?
 O may that god-like deed, that shining page,
 Redeem OUR fame, and consecrate OUR age!

And see, the cherub° Mercy from above, angel
 Descending softly, quits the sphere of love!
 265 On feeling hearts she sheds celestial dew,
 And breathes her spirit o'er th'enlightened few;
 From soul to soul the spreading influence steals,
 Till every breast the soft contagion feels.
 She bears, exulting, to the burning shore
 270 The loveliest office angel ever bore;
 To vindicate the pow'r in Heaven adored,
 To still the clank of chains, and sheathe the sword;
 To cheer the mourner, and with soothing hands
 From bursting hearts unbind th'oppressor's bands;
 275 To raise the lustre of the Christian name,
 And clear the foulest blot° that dims its fame. stain

¹ PENN William Penn (1644–1718), an influential Quaker and the founder of Pennsylvania, attempted to live peacefully with the Lenape, its aboriginal inhabitants.

² laurels Victories; accomplishments. Crowns made of leaves of the bay laurel were awarded in ancient Greece as a symbol of victory or poetic achievement.

³ [More's note] The Quakers have emancipated all their slaves throughout America.

As the mild Spirit hovers o'er the coast,
 A fresher hue the withered landscapes boast;
 Her healing smiles the ruined scenes repair,
 280 And blasted Nature wears a joyous air.
 She spreads her blest commission from above,
 Stamped with the sacred characters of love;
 She tears the banner stained with blood and tears,
 And, LIBERTY! thy shining standard rears!
 285 As the bright ensign's° glory she displays, flag's
 See pale OPPRESSION faints beneath the blaze!
 The giant dies! no more his frown appalls,
 The chain untouched, drops off; the fetter° falls. shackle
 Astonished echo tells the vocal shore,
 290 Oppression's fall'n, and slavery is no more!
 The dusky myriads° crowd the sultry⁴ plain, multitudes
 And hail that mercy long invoked in vain.
 Victorious pow'r! she bursts their two-fold bands,
 And FAITH and FREEDOM spring from Mercy's hands.

Ann Yearsley, "A Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave-Trade" (1788)

Ann Yearsley, a laboring-class milkwoman, was saved from near-destitution when Hannah More discovered her poetic abilities and became her patron. By the time Yearsley and More wrote their major abolitionist poems, both of which were published in the same year, the friendship had ended over disagreements as to how Yearsley's profits should be managed.

Bristol,⁵ thine heart hath throbbed to glory.—Slaves, E'en Christian slaves, have shook their chains, and gazed
 With wonder and amazement on thee. Hence
 Ye grov'ling souls, who think the term I give,
 5 Of Christian slave, a paradox! to you
 I do not turn, but leave you to conception
 Narrow; with that be blest, nor dare to stretch
 Your shackled souls along the course of Freedom.

⁴ sultry Hot and humid, i.e., from hot work.

⁵ Bristol A major port for marine trade and Yearsley's hometown; Bristol experienced great economic growth as a result of slavery.

Yet, Bristol, list!^o nor deem Lactilla's¹ soul listen
 Lessened by distance; snatch her rustic thought,
 Her crude ideas, from their panting state,
 And let them fly in wide expansion; lend
 Thine energy, so little understood
 By the rude million, and I'll dare the strain
 Of Heav'n-born Liberty till Nature moves
 Obedient to her voice. Alas! my friend,
 Strong rapture dies within the soul, while Pow'r
 Drags on his bleeding victims. Custom,² Law,
 Ye blessings, and ye curses of mankind,
 What evils do ye cause? We feel enslaved,
 Yet move in your direction. Custom, thou
 Wilt preach up filial piety; thy sons
 Will groan, and stare with impudence at Heav'n,
 As if they did abjure^o the act, where Sin renounce
 Sits full on Inhumanity; the church
 They fill with mouthing, vap'rous sighs and tears,
 Which, like the guileful crocodile's,³ oft fall,
 Nor fall, but at the cost of human bliss.
 Custom, thou hast undone us! led us far
 From God-like probity,^o from truth, moral integrity and heaven.

But come, ye souls who feel for human woe,
 Though dressed in savage guise! Approach, thou son,
 Whose heart would shudder at a father's chains,
 And melt o'er thy loved brother as he lies
 Gasping in torment undeserved. Oh, sight
 Horrid and insupportable! far worse
 Than an immediate, an heroic death;
 Yet to this sight I summon thee. Approach,
 Thou slave of avarice, that canst see the maid
 Weep o'er her inky sire! Spare me, thou God
 Of all-indulgent Mercy, if I scorn
 This gloomy wretch, and turn my tearful eye
 To more enlightened beings. Yes, my tear
 Shall hang on the green furze,⁴ like pearly dew
 Upon the blossom of the morn. My song

¹ Lactilla Yearsley often refers to herself by this name, a reference to her work as a milkwoman.

² Custom Tradition; practices dictated by cultural habit.

³ crocodile It was said that crocodiles cry as they devour their prey.

⁴ furze Gorse, a prickly shrub.

Shall teach sad Philomel⁵ a louder note,
 When Nature swells her woe. O'er suffering man
 My soul with sorrow bends! Then come, ye few
 Who feel a more than cold, material essence;
 Here ye may vent your sighs, till the bleak North
 Find its adherents aided.—Ah, no more!
 The dingy youth comes on, sullen in chains;
 He smiles on the rough sailor, who aloud
 Strikes at the spacious heav'n, the earth, the sea,
 In breath too blasphemous; yet not to him
 Blasphemous, for he dreads not either:—lost
 In dear internal imagery, the soul
 Of Indian Luco⁶ rises to his eyes,
 Silent, not inexpressive: the strong beams
 With eager wildness yet drink in the view
 Of his too humble home, where he had left
 His mourning father, and his Incilanda.

Curse on the toils spread by a Christian hand
 To rob the Indian of his freedom! Curse
 On him who from a bending parent steals
 His dear support of age, his darling child;
 Perhaps a son, or a more tender daughter,
 Who might have closed his eyelids, as the spark
 Of life gently retired. Oh, thou poor world!
 Thou fleeting good to individuals! see
 How much for thee they care, how wide they ope
 Their helpless arms to clasp thee; vapour thou!
 More swift than passing wind! thou leav'st them nought
 Amid th'unreal scene, but a scant grave.

I know the crafty merchant will oppose
 The plea of nature to my strain, and urge
 His toils are for his children: the soft plea
 Dissolves my soul—but when I sell a son,
 Thou God of nature, let it be my own!

Behold that Christian! see what horrid joy
 Lights up his moody features, while he grasps
 The wished-for gold, purchase of human blood!
 Away, thou seller of mankind! Bring on

⁵ Philomel In Greek mythology, Philomela was raped by King Tereus and swore to tell the world of the injustice done to her. In some versions, the gods turned her into a nightingale (a bird known for its mournful song).

⁶ Indian Luco Luco appears at times to be of African, and at others to be of Caribbean origin; such ambiguous portrayals of Africans and New World aboriginals were not uncommon in the eighteenth century.

Thy daughter to this market! bring thy wife!
 85 Thine aged mother, though of little worth,
 With all thy ruddy boys! Sell them, thou wretch,
 And swell the price of Luco!¹ Why that start?
 Why gaze as thou wouldst fright me from my challenge
 With look of anguish? Is it Nature strains
 90 Thine heart-strings at the image? Yes, my charge
 Is full against her, and she rends thy soul,
 While I but strike upon thy pityless ear,
 Fearing her rights are violated.—Speak,
 Astound the voice of Justice! bid thy tears
 95 Melt the un pitying pow'r, while thus she claims
 The pledges of thy love. Oh, throw thine arm
 Around thy little ones, and loudly plead
 Thou canst not sell thy children.—Yet, beware
 Lest Luco's groan be heard; should that prevail,
 100 Justice will scorn thee in her turn, and hold
 Thine act against thy prayer. Why clasp, she cries,
 That blooming youth? Is it because thou lov'st him?
 Why Luco was belov'd: then wilt thou feel,
 Thou selfish Christian, for thy private woe,
 105 Yet cause such pangs to him that is a father?
 Whence comes thy right to barter for thy fellows?
 Where are thy statutes? Whose the iron pen
 That gave thee precedent? Give me the seal
 Of virtue, or religion, for thy trade,
 110 And I will ne'er upbraid thee; but if force
 Superior, hard brutality alone
 Become thy boast, hence to some savage haunt,
 Nor claim protection from my social laws.
 Luco is gone; his little brothers weep,
 115 While his fond mother climbs the hoary^o rock ancient Whose point o'er-hangs the main.^o No Luco there, sea
 No sound, save the hoarse billows.^o On she roves, waves
 With love, fear, hope, holding alternate rage
 In her too anxious bosom. Dreary main!
 120 Thy murmurs now are riot, while she stands
 List'ning to ev'ry breeze, waiting the step
 Of gentle Luco. Ah, return! return!
 Too hapless mother, thy indulgent arms
 Shall never clasp thy fettered Luco more.
 125 See Incilanda! artless maid, my soul
 Keeps pace with thee, and mourns. Now o'er the hill

She creeps, with timid foot, while Sol² embrowns
 The bosom of the isle, to where she left
 Her faithful lover: here the well-known cave,
 130 By nature formed amid the rock, endears
 The image of her Luco; here his pipe,
 Formed of the polished cane,^o neglected lies, plant stem
 No more to vibrate;^o here the useless dart, produce sound
 The twanging bow, and the fierce panther's skin, 135 Salute the virgin's eye. But where is Luco?
 He comes not down the steep, though he had vowed,
 When the sun's beams at noon should sidelong gild
 The cave's wide entrance, he would swift descend
 To bless his Incilanda. Ten pale moons
 140 Had glided by, since to his generous breast
 He clasped the tender maid, and whispered love.
 Oh, mutual sentiment! thou dang'rous bliss!
 So exquisite, that Heav'n had been unjust
 Had it bestowed less exquisite of ill;
 145 When thou art held no more, thy pangs are deep,
 Thy joys convulsive to the soul; yet all
 Are meant to smooth th' uneven road of life.
 For Incilanda, Luco ranged the wild,
 Holding her image to his panting heart;
 150 For her he strained the bow, for her he stripped
 The bird of beauteous plumage; happy hour,
 When with these guiltless trophies he adorned
 The brow of her he loved. Her gentle breast
 With gratitude was filled, nor knew she aught
 155 Of language strong enough to paint her soul,
 Or ease the great emotion; whilst her eye
 Pursued the gen'rous Luco to the field,
 And glowed with rapture at his wished return.
 Ah, sweet suspense! betwixt the mingled cares
 160 Of friendship, love, and gratitude, so mixed,
 That ev'n the soul may cheat herself.—Down, down,
 Intruding Memory! bid thy struggles cease,
 At this soft scene of innate war. What sounds Break on her ear? She, starting, whispers "Luco."
 165 Be still, fond maid; list to the tardy step
 Of leaden-footed woe. A father comes,
 But not to seek his son, who from the deck
 Had breathed a last adieu: no, he shuts out
 The soft, fallacious gleam of hope, and turns
 170 Within upon the mind: horrid and dark

¹ swell the ... of Luco I.e., profit even more than you would have by selling Luco alone.

² Sol In Roman mythology, the god of the sun.

Are his wild, unenlightened pow'rs: no ray
Of forced philosophy to calm his soul,
But all the anarchy of wounded nature.

Now he arraigns his country's gods, who sit,
In his bright fancy, far beyond the hills,
Unriveting the chains of slaves: his heart
Beats quick with stubborn fury, while he doubts
Their justice to his child. Weeping old man,
Hate not a Christian's God, whose record holds
Thine injured Luco's name. Frighted he starts,
Blasphemes the Deity, whose altars rise
Upon the Indian's helpless neck, and sinks,
Despising comfort, till by grief and age
His angry spirit is forced out. Oh, guide,
Ye angel-forms, this joyless shade to worlds
Where the poor Indian, with the sage, is proved
The work of a Creator. Pause not here,
Distracted maid! ah, leave the breathless form,
On whose cold cheek thy tears so swiftly fall,
Too unavailing! On this stone, she cries,
My Luco sat, and to the wand'ring stars
Pointed my eye, while from his gentle tongue
Fell old traditions of his country's woe.
Where now shall Incilanda seek him? Hence,
Defenceless mourner, ere the dreary night
Wrap thee in added horror. Oh, Despair,
How eagerly thou rend'st the heart! She pines
In anguish deep, and sullen: Luco's form
Pursues her, lives in restless thought, and chides
Soft consolation. Banished from his arms,
She seeks the cold embrace of death; her soul
Escapes in one sad sigh. Too hapless^o maid! unfortunate
Yet happier far than he thou lov'dst; his tear,
His sigh, his groan avail not, for they plead
Most weakly with a Christian. Sink, thou wretch, Whose act shall on the cheek of Albion's^o sons England's Throw Shame's red blush: thou, who hast frighted^o far scared away
Those simple wretches from thy God, and taught
Their erring minds to mourn his partial love,¹
Profusely poured on thee, while they are left

Neglected to thy mercy. Thus deceived,
How doubly dark must be their road to death!

Luco is borne around the neighb'ring isles,
Losing the knowledge of his native shore
215 Amid the pathless wave; destined to plant
The sweet luxuriant cane.^o He strives to please, sugarcane
Nor once complains, but greatly^o smothers grief. nobly
His hands are blistered, and his feet are worn,
Till ev'ry stroke dealt by his mattock² gives 220 Keen agony to life; while from his breast
The sigh arises, burdened with the name
Of Incilanda. Time inures the youth,
His limbs grow nervous, strained by willing toil;
And resignation, or a calm despair,
225 (Most useful either) lulls him to repose.

A Christian renegade, that from his soul
Abjures the tenets of our schools, nor dreads
A future punishment, nor hopes for mercy,
Had fled from England, to avoid those laws
230 Which must have made his life a retribution
To violated justice, and had gained,
By fawning guile, the confidence (ill placed)
Of Luco's master. O'er the slave he stands
With knotted whip, lest fainting nature shun
235 The task too arduous, while his cruel soul,
Unnat'ral, ever feeds, with gross delight,
Upon his sufferings. Many slaves there were,
But none who could suppress the sigh, and bend,
So quietly as Luco: long he bore
240 The stripes, that from his manly bosom drew
The sanguine^o stream (too little prized); bloody at length
Hope fled his soul, giving her struggles o'er,
And he resolved to die. The sun had reached
His zenith—pausing faintly, Luco stood, 245 Leaning upon his hoe, while mem'ry brought,
In piteous imag'ry, his aged father,
His poor fond mother, and his faithful maid:
The mental group in wildest motion set
Fruitless imagination; fury, grief,
250 Alternate shame, the sense of insult, all
Conspire to aid the inward storm; yet words
Were no relief, he stood in silent woe.

Gorgon, remorseless Christian, saw the slave

¹ [Yearsley's note] Indians have been often heard to say, in their complaining moments, "God Almighty no love us well; he be good to buckera [white people]; he bid buckera burn us; he no burn buckera."

² mattock Tool for digging.

Stand musing, 'mid the ranks, and, stealing soft
 255 Behind the studious Luco, struck his cheek
 With a too-heavy whip, that reached his eye,
 Making it dark forever. Luco turned,
 In strongest agony, and with his hoe
 Struck the rude Christian on the forehead. Pride, 260 With hateful malice, seize on Gorgon's soul,
 By nature fierce; while Luco sought the beach,
 And plunged beneath the wave; but near him lay
 A planter's barge, whose seamen grasped his hair
 Dragging to life a wretch who wished to die.
 265 Rumour now spreads the tale, while Gorgon's breath
 Envenomed, aids her blast: imputed crimes
 Oppose the plea of Luco, till he scorns
 Even a just defence, and stands prepared.
 The planters, conscious that to fear alone
 270 They owe their cruel pow'r, resolve to blend
 New torment with the pangs of death, and hold
 Their victims high in dreadful view, to fright
 The wretched number left. Luco is chained
 To a huge tree, his fellow-slaves are ranged 275 To share the horrid sight; fuel is placed
 In an increasing train, some paces back,
 To kindle slowly, and approach the youth,
 With more than native terror. See, it burns!
 He gazes on the growing flame, and calls
 280 For "water, water!" The small boon's denied.
 E'en Christians throng each other, to behold
 The different alterations of his face,
 As the hot death approaches. (Oh, shame, shame
 Upon the followers of Jesus! shame
 285 On him that dares avow a God!) He writhes,
 While down his breast glide the unpitied tears,
 And in their sockets strain their scorched balls.
 "Burn, burn me quick! I cannot die!" he cries:
 "Bring fire more close!" The planters heed him not, 290 But still prolonging Luco's torture, threat^o threaten
 Their trembling slaves around. His lips are dry,
 His senses seem to quiver, ere they quit
 His frame for ever, rallying strong, then driv'n
 From the tremendous conflict. Sight no more 295 Is Luco's, his parched tongue is ever mute;
 Yet in his soul his Incilanda stays,
 Till both escape together. Turn, my muse,
 From this sad scene; lead Bristol's milder soul

To where the solitary spirit roves,
 300 Wrapt in the robe of innocence, to shades
 Where pity breathing in the gale, dissolves
 The mind, when fancy paints such real woe.
 Now speak, ye Christians (who for gain enslave
 A soul like Luco's, tearing her¹ from joy
 305 In life's short vale; and if there be a hell,
 As ye believe, to that ye thrust her down,
 A blind, involuntary victim), where
 Is your true essence of religion? where Your proofs of righteousness, when ye conceal 310 The knowledge of the deity from those Who would adore him fervently? Your God
 Ye rob of worshippers, his altars keep Unhailed, while driving from the sacred font²
 The eager slave, lest he should hope in Jesus.
 315 Is this your piety? Are these your laws,
 Whereby the glory of the Godhead spreads
 O'er barb'rous climes? Ye hypocrites, disown
 The Christian name, nor shame its cause: yet where Shall souls like yours find welcome? Would the Turk, 320 Pagan, or wildest Arab, ope their arms
 To gain such proselytes?^o No; he that owns converts
 The name of Mussulman^o would start, and shun Muslim
 Your worse than serpent touch; he frees his slave
 Who turns to Mahomet.³ The Spaniard⁴ stands
 325 Your brighter contrast; he condemns the youth
 Forever to the mine; but ere the wretch
 Sinks to the deep domain, the hand of faith
 Bathes his faint temples in the sacred stream,
 Bidding his spirit hope. Briton, dost thou 330 Act up to this? If so, bring on thy slaves
 To Calv'ry's mount,⁵ raise high their kindred souls
 To him who died to save them: this alone
 Will teach them calmly to obey thy rage,
 And deem a life of misery but a day,
 335 To long eternity. Ah, think how soon

¹ her I.e., the soul.

² sacred font Bowl of water for baptism.

³ [Yearsley's note] The Turk gives freedom to his slave on condition that he embraces Mahometism [Islam].

⁴ [Yearsley's note] The Spaniard, immediately on purchasing an Indian, gives him baptism.

⁵ Calv'ry's mount Mount Calvary is where Christ was crucified (See Luke 23.33).

Thine head shall on earth's dreary pillow lie,
 With thy poor slaves, each silent, and unknown
 To his once furious neighbour. Think how swift
 The sands of time ebb out, for him and thee.
 340 Why groans that Indian youth, in burning chains
 Suspended o'er the beach? The lab'ring sun
 Strikes from his full meridian° on the slave height
 Whose arms are blistered by the heated iron,
 Which still corroding, seeks the bone. What crime
 345 Merits so dire a death?¹ Another gasps
 With strongest agony, while life declines
 From recent amputation. Gracious God!
 Why thus in mercy let thy whirlwinds sleep
 O'er a vile race of Christians, who profane
 350 Thy glorious attributes? Sweep them from earth,
 Or check their cruel pow'r: the savage tribes
 Are angels when compared to brutes like these.

Advance, ye Christians, and oppose my strain:
 Who dares condemn it? Prove from laws divine,
 355 From deep philosophy, or social love,
 That ye derive your privilege. I scorn
 The cry of Av'rice, or the trade that drains
 A fellow-creature's blood: bid Commerce plead
 Her public good, her nation's many wants,
 360 Her sons thrown idly on the beach, forbade
 To seize the image of their God and sell it:²—
 I'll hear her voice, and Virtue's hundred tongues
 Shall sound against her. Hath our public good Fell rapine° for its basis? Must our wants barbarous plunder
 365 Find their supply in murder? Shall the sons

[Yearsley's note] A Coromantin slave in Jamaica (who had frequently escaped to the mountains) was, a few years since, doomed to have his leg cut off. A young practitioner from England (after the surgeon of the estate had refused to be an executioner) undertook the operation, but after the removal of the limb, on the slave's exclaiming, "You buckera! God Almighty made dat leg; you cut it off! You put it on again?" was so shocked that the other surgeon was obliged to take up [close] the [blood] vessels, apply the dressings, &c. The Negro suffered without a groan, called for his pipe, and calmly smoked, till the absence of his attendant gave him an opportunity of tearing off his bandages, when he bled to death in an instant.

Many will call this act of the Negro's stubbornness; under such circumstances, I dare give it a more glorious epithet, and that is fortitude. [Coromantins, from the Gold Coast, were often mentioned in anti-slavery writings as exemplars of defiant courage.]

² Her sons ... sell it Commerce's complaint is that the slave traders will be unemployed if they are unable to sell people.

Of Commerce shiv'ring stand, if not employed
 Worse than the midnight robber? Curses fall
 On the destructive system that shall need
 Such base supports! Doth England need them? No;
 370 Her laws, with prudence, hang the meagre thief
 That from his neighbour steals a slender sum,
 Though famine drove him on. O'er him the priest,
 Beneath the fatal tree, laments the crime,
 Approves the law, and bids him calmly die.
 375 Say, doth this law, that dooms the thief, protect
 The wretch who makes another's life his prey,
 By hellish force to take it at his will?
 Is this an English law, whose guidance fails
 When crimes are swelled to magnitude so vast,
 380 That Justice dare not scan them? Or does Law Bid Justice an eternal distance keep
 From England's great tribunal, when the slave Calls loud on Justice only? Speak, ye few
 Who fill Britannia's senate, and are deemed 385 The fathers of your country! Boast your laws,
 Defend the honour of a land so fall'n,
 That Fame from ev'ry battlement is flown,
 And Heathens start, e'en at a Christian's name.
 Hail, social love! true soul of order, hail!
 390 Thy softest emanations, pity, grief,
 Lively emotion, sudden joy, and pangs,
 Too deep for language, are thy own: then rise,
 Thou gentle angel! spread thy silken wings
 O'er drowsy man, breathe in his soul, and give 395 Her God-like pow'rs thy animating force,
 To banish Inhumanity. Oh, loose
 The fetters of his mind, enlarge his views,
 Break down for him the bound° of avarice, lift limit
 His feeble faculties beyond a world
 400 To which he soon must prove a stranger! Spread
 Before his ravished eye the varied tints
 Of future glory; bid them live to Fame,
 Whose banners wave forever. Thus inspired,
 All that is great, and good, and sweetly mild,
 405 Shall fill his noble bosom. He shall melt,
 Yea, by thy sympathy unseen, shall feel
 Another's pang: for the lamenting maid
 His heart shall heave a sigh; with the old slave (Whose head is bent with sorrow) he shall cast
 410 His eye back on the joys of youth, and say,

415 "Thou once couldst feel, as I do, love's pure bliss;
 Parental fondness, and the dear returns
 Of filial tenderness were thine, till torn
 From the dissolving scene."—Oh, social love,
 Thou universal good, thou that canst fill
 The vacuum of immensity, and live
 In endless void! thou that in motion first Set'st the long lazy atoms,^o by thy force particles
 Quickly assimilating, and restrained
 420 By strong attraction; touch the soul of man;
 Subdue him; make a fellow-creature's woe
 His own by heart-felt sympathy, whilst wealth
 Is made subservient to his soft disease.
 And when thou hast to high perfection wrought
 425 This mighty work, say, "such is Bristol's soul."

Immigration to America from William Moraley, The Infortunate: The Voyage and Adventures of William Moraley, an Indentured Servant (1743)

About half of the Europeans who came in search of opportunity in the British colonies of North America were indentured servants, people who sold their freedom and their labor for a term of years in exchange for the cost of travel to the New World.
 One of these was William Moraley, who chose to immigrate after his father's death left him impoverished. Although his decision to write an autobiography was atypical of someone of his class, Moraley—an individual without extensive family ties, not wholly destitute but without promising employment—was in other ways typical of the migrants who left England's urban centers in the eighteenth century. It was also a common experience (and became even more so in the nineteenth century) for migrants to America to return to Britain after a few years, sometimes with their fortunes made but frequently in disappointment. Still others, even more unfortunate than Moraley, never managed to save enough for passage home.

... [N]ot caring what became of me, it entered my head to leave England and sell myself for a term of years into the American plantations. Accordingly I repaired to the Royal Exchange, to inform myself, by the printed advertisements fixed against the walls, of the ships bound to America; where musing by myself, a man accosted me in the following manner. "Sir," said he, "I have for some time observed you, and fancy your condition of life is altered for the worse, and guess you have been in better circumstances; but if you will take my advice, I'll make it my business to find out some way which may be of service to you. Perhaps you may imagine I have a design to inveigle¹ you, but I assure you I have none; and if you will accept a mug of beer, I will impart what I have to propose to you." The man appearing sincere, I gave ear to him.

I was dressed at that time in a very odd manner. I had on a red rug coat² with black lining, black buttons and button holes, and black lace upon the pockets and facing; an old worn out tie wig,³ which had not been combed out for above a fortnight;⁴ an unshaven beard;
 a torn shirt that had not been washed for above a month; bad shoes; and stockings all full of holes.

After he had shaved me, he proposed to me an American voyage, and said there was a ship at Limehouse dock that would sail for Pennsylvania in three or four days. "Sir," said I, "a person like me, oppressed by Dame Fortune, need not care where he goes. All places are alike to me; and I am very willing to accept of your offer, if I could have some view of bettering my condition of life, though I might have expected a better fate than to be forced to leave my native country. But adverse fortune is become familiar to me, by a series of misfortunes; so had rather leave a place where I have no prospect of advancing myself, than to continue here where I have no friends to relieve me. Besides, in a distant place, not being known, no person can reflect on me for any ill management, which oftentimes discourages one's friends from supporting one, knowing the ill use that is made of their support."

"Sir," says the person, "I'm entirely of your way of thinking, and believe you will better yourself by following my advice. I will recommend you to the

¹ inveigle Deceitfully persuade.

² rug coat Coat made of coarse wool.

³ tie wig Wig tied in the back with ribbon.

⁴ fortnight Two weeks.

captain, who is bound for Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania, a country producing everything necessary for the support of life; and when your time is expired, you will be free to live in any of the Provinces of America."

Then he asked me, if I was bred to any business. I told him watchmaking was my occupation. He said he was afraid I would not do for any other business, that being of little service to the Americans; the useful trades being bricklayers, shoemakers, barbers, carpenters, joiners, smiths, weavers, bakers, tanners, and husbandmen¹ more useful than all the rest. They bind themselves for four years; but if I would consent to bind myself for five, he said he would undertake to get me admitted. Those men brokers have generally for their pains three half crowns, given them by the masters of those vessels which they are employed for.

After we had drank two pints of beer, he paid the reckoning.² I absolutely agreed to go, and to that intent we went before Sir Robert Bailis, Lord Mayor, where I was sworn as not being a married person or an apprentice by indenture. He paid for my oath one shilling, a perquisite of³ his clerk. From thence we went to London Bridge, to a stationer's shop, and there an Indenture of Servitude was drawn, which I signed. After this we took boat at Billingsgate, steered our course for Limehouse, where we arrived about eleven o'clock in the forenoon. The ship was named the Bonetta, of about 200 tons. ...

I observed several of my brother adventurers seemed very dejected, from whence I guessed they repented of their rashness. Soon after, dinner was brought on the table, which consisted of stewed mutton chops. I was very glad I had an opportunity of trying the temper of my tusks,⁴ for I had not eaten meat for four days. I ate very heartily and washed down the mutton with about two quarts of small beer.⁵ I began to think myself happy, being in a way to eat; and on this account became insensible of the condition I had brought myself to. In the afternoon, the master and mate being absent, I ventured into the cabin and, peeping into a chest, discovered a large quantity of raisins, of which I made free with about two pound, and pocketed them for my own use. Besides, the small beer stood upon deck and was free of us at all times, so that laying all reflections aside, I comforted myself with the hopes of living well all the voyage, but was soon made sensible to the contrary when we set out to sea.

[On the voyage]

...[W]e were stinted in our allowance, being joined together in messes: five to each mess. Three biscuits were given to each man for the day, and a small piece of salt beef no bigger than a penny chop of mutton. Some days we had stockfish,⁶ when every man was obliged to beat his share with a maul⁷ to make it tender, with a little stinking butter for sauce.

Every morning and evening a captain called every one of us to the cabin door, where we received a thimble full of bad brandy. We were obliged to turn out every four hours, with the sailors, to watch; which was to prevent our falling sick by herding under deck.

In our voyage we observed little worth taking notice of till we were in latitude 33, when the sun was intensely hot, which so parched our bodies, having but a scanty allowance of water, not above three quarts to each mess. We attempted to drink the salt water, but it increased our thirst. Sometimes, but rarely, it rained, when we set our hats upon deck to catch the water; but it sliding down the sails gave it the taste of tar. ...

[In Pennsylvania]

My master employed me in his business: I continued satisfied with him for sometime; but being desirous to settle at Philadelphia during the rest of my servitude, I declared to him, I would stay no longer and desired him to dispose of me to some other master. ... This demand made him cross to me, and I attempted an escape, but was taken and put into prison; but was soon released, with a promise to satisfy my demand. About a fortnight after, we went to the Mayor of Philadelphia—his name was Griffith, a man of exact justice, though an Irishman

¹ husbandmen Farmers.

² reckoning Cost.

³ perquisite of Gratuity for.

⁴ temper of my tusks I.e., condition of my teeth.

small beer Thin beer containing little alcohol.

⁶ stockfish Air dried, unsalted fish.

maul Hammer.

—who reconciled us; so I returned back to Burlington, and continued with him three years, he forgiving me the other two: I was ever after perfectly pleased with my master's behaviour to me, which was generous. ...

The condition of bought servants is very hard, notwithstanding their indentures are made in England, wherein it is expressly stipulated that they shall have at their arrival all the necessities specified in those indentures to be given them by their future masters, such as clothes, meat, and drink. Yet upon complaint made to a magistrate against the master for nonperformance, the master is generally heard before the servant, and it is ten to one if he does not get his licks for his pains, as I have experienced upon the like occasion, to my cost.

If they endeavour to escape, which is next to impossible, there being a reward for taking up any person who travels without a pass, which is extended all over the British Colonies, their masters immediately issue out a reward for the apprehending them, from thirty shillings to five pound, as they think proper, and this generally brings them back again. Printed and written advertisements are also set up against the trees and public places in the town, besides those in the newspapers. Notwithstanding these difficulties, they are perpetually running away, but seldom escape, for a hot pursuit being made brings them back, when a justice settles the expenses, and the servant is obliged to serve a longer time. ...

At last ... the time of my servitude expired, and I became free. 'Tis impossible to express the satisfaction I found at being released from the precarious humour and dependence of my master. He accoutered¹ me in an indifferent manner, and gave me my discharge to find out a new way of living. I then went to Philadelphia and served one Edmund Lewis, a brisk young clock-maker; but he being unsettled, and of a roving temper (like master, like man!), I left him, and lived with Mr. Graham, a watch-maker, newly arrived, and nephew to the famous Mr. Graham in Fleet Street.² With him I continued ten weeks at ten shillings per week wages, and my board found me;³ but he designing to settle at Antigua,⁴ I left him.

Then I roamed about like a Roving Tartar⁵ for the convenience of grazing, and for three weeks had no abiding place. In the nights I was forced to skulk about the extremity of the town, where I lay in a hayloft. ...

But this life not being likely to last long, ... I set my wits to work how to get home. But not presently hearing of a ship bound for England, I was reduced to such extremity that I looked like a picture of bad luck, and so thin that you might have seen my ribs through my skin, and I was greatly afraid of a consumption.⁶ However, having some acquaintance in the country, I went about cleaning clocks and watches, and followed the occupation of a tinker; but not being well versed in that trade, where I mended one hole I was sure to make another. ...

I now began to be heartily tired with these ramblings, and endeavoured to make friends with masters of ships in order to get my passage. One morning, as I was forging a horseshoe, a grave Quaker, one Thomas Wetheril of Workington in Cumberland, told me he found the business I followed would do little for me, and advised me to return home, where he heard I had considerable relations. He said he had recommended me to Capt. Peel, whose ship then lay at the key and would sail in about five weeks.

I, who had before resolved to embrace the first opportunity that offered, readily entered into his measures, immediately left the horse shoe unfinished and went to the ship.

from Lady Lucan, "On the Present State of Ireland" (1768)

The British were highly alarmed by the numbers of migrants leaving Ireland in the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The causes of emigration were apparent to English poet Margaret Bingham, Countess of Lucan, who observed firsthand the

¹ accoutered Equipped.

² famous ... Fleet Street George Graham (1675–1751), accomplished London clock-maker and inventor.

³ my board found me My food and lodging provided to me.

⁴ Antigua Island in the Caribbean.

⁵ Roving Tartar Desert nomad.

consumption Lung infection.

widespread poverty that weighed on the nation. While a series of climate-induced famines exacerbated the suffering of the poor, political mismanagement by the English government was a much larger problem. Legislation prevented the advancement of Ireland's industry while allowing England to exploit its resources, and absentee landlords living in England charged unreasonable rents to their poor tenants, drawing large amounts of money out of the Irish economy. The poorest Irish people were generally not, however, the ones to migrate; most of those who could afford to leave were the relatively well-off Scotch-Irish, who exerted strong cultural influence in colonial America, especially in the Appalachian region. The Irish poor would emigrate in vast numbers later on, prompted by the Great Famine of the nineteenth century.

See! with what pale and mournful look appears,
 England! Thy faithful sister drowned in tears.
 Thus wronged Hibernia^o sues to Britain's throne: Ireland
 Where is thy justice, where thy wisdom flown?
 In me a suffering, loyal, people see,
 Harassed and torn, by wanton tyranny.
 Hear this, ye great, as from the feast ye rise,
 Which every plundered element supplies!
 Hear when fatigued, not nourished, ye have dined,
 The food of thousands to its roots confined!¹
 Eternal fasts that know no taste of bread;
 Nor where who sows the corn, by corn is fed.

¹ [Lucan's note] The situation of these miserable people in the province that I am most acquainted with is truly lamentable. The lower class never eat meat or bread, not even on Christmas Day (when the poor of all other countries make a feast), but are confined to potatoes for food, and to water for their drink. A working man, who labours from six o'clock in the morning to six in the evening, has nothing to support him but roots and water; four pence is the price of a day labourer in Connaught; in other parts I believe it is something more, but a very trifle. Let his majesty ask those who have had the curiosity to visit the interior parts of the country; let him ask one of the lords of his bed-chamber, who lately made a tour through Ireland, and he will find that I do not exaggerate.—As to their cottages, such is their wretched poverty, that it is a known fact, the cottager frequently pulls it down to exempt himself from paying the hearth tax, which is two shillings only, but which he is absolutely unable to pay; and he and his family remain exposed to all the inclemencies of the open air, until the time of collecting this cruel tax is passed....

Throughout the year, no feast e'er crowns his board,^o

table

Four pence a day, ah! what can that afford?
 15 So poor their country where they strive to live,
 No ampler pay can starving farmers give.
 Did you not blast us with a jealous eye,
 Our industry and arts with yours would vie.
 Nature's best face in our soft clime is shown,
 20 And commerce here would gladly fix her throne.
 E'en might that commerce far as India roam,
 No Irish soul would chain that wealth at home.
 Fools that ye are, to you that wealth would roll,
 And, lodestone^o like, you would attract the magnet whole.

25 But you are swayed by narrow policy,
 And in a friend a hated rival see.
 Our journals show with how profuse a hand
 Hibernian senates give, on your demand;
 Freely they give, nor aught from you require,
 30 But justice, only justice they desire.
 Your gratitude unlike our bounty flows;
 Our idleness this truth too plainly shows;
 One trade alone, your jealousy affords,²
 (To paint such mighty folly, grant me words!)
 35 One trade alone, is to this people given,
 Though blessed with every requisite by Heaven.
 And when for taxes, pensions, loud you cry,
 Like fools you stop the means of your supply.
 To English marts alone our wool must speed,³
 40 And sinks or swells its value as they bid.
 What free born souls will such oppression bear?

² [Lucan's note] The linen is the only trade carried on to any extent in Ireland, and this is unjustly cramped by English policy and acts of parliament....

³ [Lucan's note] Ireland is not suffered to export any sort of woollen goods, even to those foreign markets where the English woollen manufactures are not sent. There are a variety of woollen and mixed goods which they are inclined to make in Ireland, ... which England does not run into, and which would be a most advantageous trade to Ireland. The French have beat out the English in several foreign markets, particularly in the Levant and Turkey, by making these goods; and they make them, shame to the English Parliament and ministry! with Irish smuggled wool. As to the inland woollen trade of Ireland, it is encumbered with every disadvantage, and receives every check that can be laid upon it; it is controlled and taxed so that a pair of knit woollen stockings, the labour of old age! cannot be exposed to sale without first paying a duty....

We sell to France, prevent us if you dare.
 Thus laws too strict are ever useless made,
 And enemies and rivals get your trade.
 45 For us in vain our flocks their fleeces bear;
 A sad reward for all the shepherd's care.
 To card¹ or spin, the careful housewife fears,
 She trembling draws the fleece, and spins with tears.
 Early and late her weary hours are spent,
 50 And much she toils to pay the landlord's rent.
 But when to public sale her work she'd send,
 A cruel seizure does her labours end.
 Oh! Charlotte,² lend a while thy sacred ear,
 While I recount the griefs thy subjects bear....
 55 Oh! deign to tell our tale, we ask no more.
 Thus shall our pious king our suffrings hear,
 And modest truth attain a monarch's ear.
 Bred in a faith, they guard their souls sincere.³
 For right or wrong, that faith to them is dear:
 60 'Tis what their fathers and forefathers taught,
 For which they suffered or for which they fought;
 No wonder then, though wrapped in error's night,
 They breed their sons in what they think is right,
 Various religions, still they deem the same;
 65 'Tis virtue always diff'ring but in name.
 Our gavel laws,⁴ few converts can create,
 The persecuted soul grows obstinate.
 A land of liberty can this be called,
 Where by such tyrant laws we are enthralled?

¹ card Prepare wool for spinning, i.e., by combing, parting, and straightening it with an iron-toothed comb called a card.

² Charlotte Queen Charlotte (1744–1818) of the United Kingdom.

³ Bred in ... souls sincere Lucan's footnote explains that the majority of Ireland's inhabitants were Roman Catholics, and that as such their rights were heavily restricted by the penal laws; for instance, Catholics could not purchase property or hold public office. Although Lucan was not alone in citing the penal laws as a major cause of increasing Irish emigration, the extent to which the laws actually had that effect is now contested. Some of the Irish emigrants in the eighteenth century were Catholics, but most were Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, who were also affected by some, but not all, of the penal laws.

⁴ gavel laws Part of the penal laws drawn from the Celtic tradition of Gavelkind, in which, upon the death of a father, his estate was shared equally among his sons. The gavel laws forced Catholics to undertake this practice—unless the eldest son converted to Protestantism, in which case he would inherit everything.

70 That snatch the weapon from the father's hand,
 His home exposing to the ruffian band?
 Ah! wretched parents, little you foresee
 Of gavel laws, the sad calamity;
 Laws still accursed by the good and wise,
 75 That teach the son his father to despise;
 Most cruel laws, that can such acts approve,
 Ah! sad return of our paternal love,
 That from all ties of brotherhood deters,
 And him, that's first a hypocrite prefers....
 80 Ireland awake! Raise up thy drooping head,
 Look to these laws, their consequences dread!...
 Since toleration is Britannia's pride,
 Why, by such cruel laws, is Ireland tied?
 Beware ye senators, look round in time,
 85 Rebellion is not fixed to any clime;
 For 'twould be strange, a most unnat'ral thing,
 That he who hates his sire should love his king.
 In trade, religion, every way oppressed,
 You'll find, too late, such wrongs must be redressed.
 90 Those riches in America you've lost,⁵
 May soon again be found on Ireland's coast:
 Open our ports at once with generous minds,
 Let commerce be as free as waves and winds;
 Seize quick the time, for now, consider well,
 95 Whole quarters of the world at once rebel.

from Commissioners of the Customs in Scotland,
Report of the Examination of the Emigrants from the Counties of Caithness and Sutherland on Board the Ship Bachelor of Leith Bound to Wilmington in North Carolina (1774)

British policymakers were equally concerned about the levels of emigration from Ireland and from Scotland; it was widely believed that before long the rural areas of both countries would be emptied of able laborers. Causes of emigration from Scotland were for the most part similar to those in Ireland: economic instability, unreasonably high rents, and the anticipation of greater opportunity in North

Those riches ... you've lost Although the American Revolutionary War would not begin for a few more years, in 1768 opposition to British rule of the colonies was growing increasingly violent and pronounced.

America. Anxiety surrounding emigration prompted the gathering of reports such as the one excerpted below, in which emigrants explain their reasons for leaving Scotland behind.

John Catanach, aged fifty years, by trade a farmer, married, hath 4 children from 19 to 7 years old; resided last at Chabster in the parish of Rae in the county of Caithness, upon the estate of Mr. Alexander Nicolson, minister at Thurso; intends to go to Wilmington, North Carolina; left his own country because crops failed, bread became dear, the rents of his possession were raised from two to five pounds sterling; besides his pasture or common grounds were taken up by placing new tenants thereon, especially the grounds adjacent to his farm, which were the only grounds on which his cattle pastured. That this method of parking and placing tenants on the pasture grounds rendered his farm useless; his cattle died for want of grass, and his corn farm was unfit to support his family after paying the extravagant tack duty.¹ That beside the rise of rents and scarcity of bread, the landlord exacted arbitrary and oppressive services, such as obliging the declarant to labour up his ground, cast, win, lead and stack his peats;² mow, win and lead his hay, and cut his corn and lead it in the yard, which took up about 30 or 40 days of his servants and horses each year, without the least acknowledgment for it, and without victuals,³ save the men that mowed the hay, who got their dinner only. That he was induced to emigrate by advices received from his friends in America; that provisions are extremely plenty and cheap, and the price of labour very high, so that people who are temperate and laborious have every chance of bettering their circumstances. Adds that the price of bread in the country he hath left is greatly enhanced by distilling,⁴ that being for so long a time so scarce and dear,⁵ and the price of cattle at the same time reduced full one half while the rents of lands have been raised nearly in the same proportion, all the smaller farms must inevitably be ruined.

James Duncan, aged twenty-seven years, by trade a farmer, married, hath two children, one five years the other 9 months old. Resided last at Mondle in the parish of Farr in the shire of Sutherland, upon the estate of Sutherland, intends to go to Wilmington in North Carolina; left his own country because crops failed him for several years, and among the last years of his labouring he scarce reaped any crop; bread became dear and the price of cattle so much reduced that one cow's price could only buy a boll of meal.⁶ That the people on the estate of Sutherland were often supplied with meal from Caithness, but the farmers there had of late stopped the sale of their meal, because it rendered them a much greater profit by distilling. That he could find no employment at home whereby he could support his family. That he has very promising prospects by the advices from his friends in Carolina, as they have bettered their circumstances greatly since they went there by their labours. Lands being cheap and good provisions plenty, and the price of labour very encouraging.

William Sutherland aged twenty-four, married, left an only child at home. Resided last in the parish of Latheron and county of Caithness, upon the estate of John Sutherland of Forse. Goes to Carolina because he lost his cattle in 1772, and for a farm of 40/ rent, was obliged to perform with his family and his horses so many and so arbitrary services to his landlord at all times of the year, but especially in seed time and harvest, that he could not, in two years he possessed it, raise as much corn and⁷ serve his family for six months. That, his little stock daily decreasing, he was encouraged to go to Carolina by the assurances of the fertility of the land, which yields three crops a year, by which means provisions are extremely cheap, wheat being sold at 3 shillings a boll, potatoes at 1 shilling, so that one man's labour will maintain a family of twenty persons. He has no money, therefore proposes to employ himself as a day labourer; his wife can spin and sew, and he has heard of many going out in the same way who are now substantial

¹ tack duty Lease payment.

² labour up his ground I.e., work his land; cast Cut; win Dry; lead Carry; peats Squares of bog soil used as fuel.

³ victuals Food.

⁴ the price... distilling I.e., the price of bread has increased because people are using their grain for alcohol instead.

dear Expensive.

⁶ boll Six bushels of ground grain, equivalent to about 360 pounds of wheat; meal The ground part of grain that is edible.

as much corn and Enough corn to.

farmers. At any rate he comforts himself in the hopes that he cannot be any worse than he has been at home.

Gilbert Stuart, The Skater (1782). Born in Rhode Island, Stuart traveled to England to launch his artistic career. He was apprenticed to another transatlantic artist, Benjamin West, until acclaim for this work, The Skater, established him as a popular success. The subject is Scottish politician William Grant, and the work was painted in London (Westminster Abbey is visible in the background). Stuart later returned to the United States, where he painted many important figures of early American politics; his 1796 portrait of George Washington is now reproduced on the American dollar bill.

from Benjamin Franklin, Information to Those Who Would Remove to America (1782)

Many persons in Europe, having directly or by letters expressed to the writer of this, who is well acquainted with North America, their desire of transporting and establishing themselves in that country, but who appear to have formed, through ignorance, mistaken ideas and expectations of what is to be obtained there; he thinks it may be useful, and prevent inconvenient, expensive, and fruitless removals and voyages of improper persons, if he gives some clearer and truer notions of that part of the world than appear to have hitherto prevailed.

He finds it is imagined by numbers that the inhabitants of North America are rich, capable of rewarding and disposed to reward all sorts of ingenuity; that they are at the same time ignorant of all the sciences, and, consequently, that strangers, possessing talents in the belles-lettres,¹ fine arts, &c., must be highly esteemed, and so well paid as to become easily rich themselves; that there are also abundance of profitable offices to be disposed of, which the natives are not qualified to fill; and that, having few persons of family² among them, strangers of birth must be greatly respected, and of course easily obtain the best of those offices, which will make all their fortunes; that the governments too, to encourage emigrations from Europe, not only pay the expense of personal transportation, but give lands *gratis*³ to strangers, with negroes to work for them, utensils of husbandry,⁴ and stocks of cattle. These are all wild imaginations; and those who go to America with expectations founded upon them will surely find themselves disappointed.

The truth is that though there are in that country few people so miserable as the poor of Europe, there are also very few that in Europe would be called rich; it is rather a general happy mediocrity⁵ that prevails. There are few great proprietors of the soil, and few tenants;

¹ belles-lettres Literary writing.

² persons of family People born into a high social class.

³ gratis Latin: free.

⁴ husbandry Farming.

⁵ mediocrity Averageness.

most people cultivate their own lands or follow some handicraft or merchandise; very few rich enough to live idly upon their rents or incomes, or to pay the high prices given in Europe for paintings, statues, architecture, and the other works of art that are more curious than useful. Hence the natural geniuses that have arisen in America with such talents have uniformly quitted that country for Europe, where they can be more suitably rewarded. It is true that letters and mathematical knowledge are in esteem there, but they are at the same time more common than is apprehended; there being already existing nine colleges or universities, *viz.*¹ four in New England, and one in each of the provinces of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, all furnished with learned professors; besides a number of smaller academies; these educate many of their youth in the languages, and those sciences that qualify men for the professions of divinity, law, or physic.² Strangers indeed are by no means excluded from exercising those professions; and the quick increase of inhabitants everywhere gives them a chance of employ, which they have in common with the natives. Of civil offices or employments, there are few; no superfluous ones, as in Europe; and it is a rule established in some of the states that no office should be so profitable as to make it desirable. The 36th article of the constitution of Pennsylvania runs expressly in these words: "As every freeman, to preserve his independence (if he has not a sufficient estate), ought to have some profession, calling, trade, or farm, whereby he may honestly subsist, there can be no necessity for, nor use in, establishing offices of profit; the usual effects of which are dependence and servility, unbecoming freemen, in the possessors and expectants; faction, contention, corruption, and disorder among the people. Wherefore, whenever an office, through increase of fees or otherwise, becomes so profitable as to occasion many to apply for it, the profits ought to be lessened by the legislature."

These ideas prevailing more or less in all the United States, it cannot be worth any man's while, who has a means of living at home, to expatriate himself in hopes of obtaining a profitable civil office in America; and as to military offices, they are at an end with the war, the armies being disbanded. Much less is it advisable for a person to go thither who has no other quality to recommend him but his birth. In Europe it has indeed its value; but it is a commodity that cannot be carried to a worse market than that of America, where people do not inquire concerning a stranger, What is he? but, What can he do? If he has any useful art, he is welcome; and if he exercises it, and behaves well, he will be respected by all that know him; but a mere man of quality who, on that account, wants to live upon the public by some office or salary will be despised and disregarded. The husbandman is in honor there, and even the mechanic, because their employments are useful. The people have a saying that God Almighty is himself a mechanic, the greatest in the universe; and he is respected and admired more for the variety, ingenuity, and utility of his handiworks than for the antiquity of his family. They are pleased with the observation of a negro, and frequently mention it, that Boccarorra (meaning the white men) make de black man workee, make de horse workee, make de ox workee, make ebery ting workee; only de hog. He, de hog, no workee; he eat, he drink, he walk about, he go to sleep when he please, he libb like a gentleman. According to these opinions of the Americans, one of them would think himself more obliged to a genealogist who could prove for him that his ancestors and relations for ten generations had been ploughmen, smiths, carpenters, turners, weavers, tanners, or even shoemakers, and consequently that they were useful members of society; than if he could only prove that they were gentlemen, doing nothing of value, but living idly on the labour of others, mere fruges consumere nati,³ and otherwise good for nothing, till by their death their estates, like the carcass of the negro's gentleman-hog, come to be cut up.

¹ viz. Abbreviation of the Latin videlicet, meaning "namely" or "that is to say."

² physic Medical practice.

³ fruges consumere nati Latin: born to consume the fruits (of the earth).

With regard to encouragements for strangers from government, they are really only what are derived from good laws and liberty. Strangers are welcome because there is room enough for them all, and therefore the old inhabitants are not jealous of them; the laws protect them sufficiently so that they have no need of the patronage of great men; and everyone will enjoy securely the profits of his industry. But if he does not bring a fortune with him, he must work and be industrious to live. One or two years' residence gives him all the rights of a citizen; but the government does not at present, whatever it may have done in former times, hire people to become settlers by paying their passages, giving land, negroes, utensils, stock, or any other kind of emolument¹ whatsoever. In short, America is the land of labour, and by no means what the English call Lubberland,² and the French Pays de Cocagne,³ where the streets are said to be paved with half-peck⁴ loaves, the houses tiled with pancakes, and where the fowls fly about ready roasted, crying, Come eat me!

Who then are the kind of persons to whom an emigration to America may be advantageous? And what are the advantages they may reasonably expect?

Land being cheap in that country, from the vast forests still void of inhabitants, and not likely to be occupied in an age to come, insomuch that the propriety of an hundred acres of fertile soil full of wood may be obtained near the frontiers, in many places, for eight or ten guineas,⁵ hearty young labouring men who understand the husbandry of corn and cattle, which is nearly the same in that country as in Europe, may easily establish themselves there. A little money saved of the good wages they receive there, while they work for others, enables them to buy the land and begin their plantation, in which they are assisted by the goodwill of their neighbours, and some credit. Multitudes of poor people from England, Ireland, Scotland, and Germany have by this means in a few years become wealthy farmers, who, in their own countries, where all the lands are fully occupied and the wages of labour low, could never have emerged from the poor condition wherein they were born.

From the salubrity⁶ of the air, the healthiness of the climate, the plenty of good provisions, and the encouragement to early marriages by the certainty of subsistence in cultivating the earth, the increase of inhabitants by natural generation is very rapid in America, and becomes still more so by the accession of strangers; hence there is a continual demand for more artisans of all the necessary and useful kinds, to supply those cultivators of the earth with houses, and with furniture and utensils of the grosser sorts, which cannot so well be brought from Europe. Tolerably good workmen in any of those mechanic arts are sure to find employ, and to be well paid for their work, there being no restraints preventing strangers from exercising any art they understand, nor any permission necessary. If they are poor, they begin first as servants or journeymen; and if they are sober, industrious, and frugal, they soon become masters, establish themselves in business, marry, raise families, and become respectable citizens. . . .

¹ emolument Payment or benefit.

² Lubberland The 1685 ballad "Invitation to Lubberland" describes a place of laziness and vice where the streets are "paved with pudding-pies" and the roofs tiled with pancakes.

³ Pays de Cocagne French: Land of Plenty.

⁴ half-peck I.e., large.

⁵ guineas In the late 1700s, an average American wage-earner would be paid one guinea in about two weeks.

⁶ salubrity Health-promoting quality.

Colonists and Native People

Benjamin West, William Penn's Treaty with the Indians when he founded the Province of Pennsylvania in North America (1771). Born in Pennsylvania, West was living in England when he painted this and the other large history paintings for which he is best known. The subject is William Penn, Quaker philosopher and founder of Pennsylvania, who was renowned for his unusually good relationship with the Lenape Indians of the region. Unlike (ahistorical) settlers, who are supposed to compensate native people for their land, Penn negotiated an exchange with the Lenape, trading goods for signed documents ceding land to the colonists. Historians quite rightly point out that Penn and his settlers displaced the Lenape and forced them to conform to the needs of the colony; nevertheless, the relationship between the Pennsylvanians and the Lenape was remarkably peaceful for the period and was seen as representative of ideal Indian-settler relations. (See the color insert in this volume for another example of Benjamin West's work.)

from Susannah Johnson, The Captive American, or A Narrative of the Suffering of Mrs. Johnson During Four Years Captivity with the Indians and French (1797)

The Seven Years' War was a global conflict involving France, Austria, and other allies fighting against Britain, Prussia, and their allies, both in Europe and through their colonial possessions in North and South America, Africa, India, and the Philippines. Susannah Johnson was living in present-day Charlestown, New Hampshire, during the early escalation of the North American conflict that would become part of this war. She and her family were captured by a raiding party of Abenaki Indians, who were allied with the French, having been largely forced out of New Hampshire by English colonization. The Abenaki held her captive for a few months before selling her to French settlers; when she was finally released, more than three years had passed since her capture. Years later, Johnson dictated her story to a local lawyer, and it became one of the most widely read works in the popular genre of Indian captivity narratives.

from the INTRODUCTION

During ... the Cape Breton War,¹ the town of No. 4² could hardly be said to be inhabited; some adventurers had made a beginning, but few were considered as belonging to the town. Captain Stevens, whose valour is recorded as an instance of consummate generalship, part of the time kept the fort, which afforded a shelter to the enterprising settlers in times of imminent danger. But even his vigilance did not save the town from numerous scenes of carnage. At the commencement of the peace in 1749, the enterprising spirit of New England rose superior to the dangers of the forest, and they began to venture innovation. The Indians, still thirsty for plunder and rapine,³ and regardless of the peace which their masters, the French, had concluded, kept up a flying warfare and committed several outrages upon lives and property; this kept the increasing inhabitants in a state of alarm for three or four years; most of the time they performed their daily work without molestation, but retreated to the fort at each returning night.

Our country has so long been exposed to the Indian wars that recitals of exploits and sufferings, of escapes and deliverances, have become both numerous and trite. The air of novelty will not be attempted in the following pages; simple facts, unadorned, are what the reader must expect; pity for my sufferings, and admiration at my safe return, is all that my history can excite. . . .

from CHAPTER 1

Everyone "was tremblingly alive" with fear. The Indians were reported to be on their march for our destruction, and our distance from sources of information gave full latitude for exaggerations of news before it reached our ears. The fears of the night were horrible beyond description, and even the light of day was far from dispelling painful anxiety. While looking from the windows of my log house, and seeing my neighbours tread cautiously by each hedge and hillock, lest some secreted savage might start forth to take their scalp, my fears would baffle description. Alarms grew greater and greater, till our apprehensions were too strongly confirmed by the news of the capture of Mr. Malony's family, on Merrimack River: this reached us about the 20th of August. Imagination now saw and heard a thousand Indians; and I never went round my own house without first looking with trembling caution by each corner, to see if a tomahawk was not raised for my destruction. . . .

On the evening of the 29th of August our house was visited by a party of neighbours who spent the time very cheerfully with watermelons and flip⁴ till midnight; they all then retired in high spirits, except a spruce young spark, who tarried to keep company with my sister. We then went to bed with feelings well tuned for sleep, and rested with fine composure till midway between day-break and sunrise, when we were roused by neighbour Labarree's knocking at the door, who had shouldered his

¹ Cape Breton War More commonly known as King George's War, the North American component of the War of the Austrian Succession, one of several conflicts between the major powers of Europe that spread to their colonies.

² No. 4 Present day Charlestown, New Hampshire.

³ rapine Pillage.

⁴ flip Hot alcoholic beverage.

ax to do a day's work for my husband. Mr. Johnson slipped on his jacket and trousers, and stepped to the door to let him in. But by opening the door he opened a scene—terrible to describe!—Indians! Indians! were the first words I heard; he sprang to his guns, but Labarree, heedless of danger, instead of closing the door to keep them out, began to rally our hired men upstairs for not rising earlier. But in an instant a crowd of savages, fixed horribly for war, rushed furiously in. I screamed, and begged my friends to ask for quarters.¹ By this time they were all over the house, some upstairs, some hauling my sister out of bed; another had hold of me, and one was approaching Mr. Johnson, who stood in the middle of the floor to deliver himself up; but the Indian supposing that he would make resistance, and be more than his match, went to the door and brought three of his comrades, and the four bound him. I was led to the door, fainting and trembling; there stood my friend Labarree bound; Ebenezer Farnsworth, whom they found up in his chamber, they were putting in the same situation; and, to complete the shocking scene, my three little children were driven naked to the place where I stood. On viewing myself, I found that I too was naked. An Indian had purloined three gowns who, on seeing my situation, gave me the whole. I asked another for a petticoat, but he refused it. After what little plunder their hurry would allow them to get was confusedly bundled up, we were ordered to march. After going about twenty roods,² we fell behind a rising ground, where we halted to pack the things in a better manner; while there, a savage went back, as we supposed, to fire the buildings. Farnsworth proposed to my husband to go back with him, to get a quantity of pork from the cellar to help us on the journey; but Mr. Johnson prudently replied that by that means the Indians might find the rum, and in a fit of intoxication kill us all. . . .

We all arrived safe on the other side of the river about four o'clock in the afternoon; a fire was kindled, and some of the stolen kettles were hung over it and filled with porridge. The savages took delight in viewing their spoil, which amounted to forty or fifty pounds in value. They then, with a truly savage yell, gave their war whoop and bade defiance to danger. As we tarried an hour in this place, I had time to reflect on our miserable situation. Captives, in the power of unmerciful savages, without provision and almost without clothes, in a wilderness where we must sojourn as long as the children of Israel did, for aught we knew; and, what added to our distress, not one of our savage masters could understand a word of English. . . .

The fifth day's journey was an unvaried scene of fatigue. The Indians sent out two or three hunting parties, who returned without game. As we had in the morning consumed the last morsel of our meal, everyone now began to be seriously alarmed, and hunger, with all its horrors, looked us earnestly in the face. At night, we found the waters that run into Lake Champlain, which was over the height of land; before dark we halted, and the Indians, by help of their punck,³ which they carried in horns, made a fire. They soon adopted a plan to relieve their hunger: the horse was shot, and his flesh was in a few minutes broiling on embers, and they, with native gluttony, satiated their craving appetites. To use the term politeness in the management of this repast may be thought a burlesque, yet their offering the prisoners the best parts of the horse certainly bordered on civility; an epicure could not have catered nicer slices, nor, in that situation, served them up with more neatness. Appetite is said to be the best sauce, yet our abundance of it did not render savoury this novel steak. My children, however, ate too much, which made them very unwell for a number of days. Broth was made for me and my child,⁴ which was rendered almost a luxury by the seasoning of roots. After supper, countenances began to brighten; those who had relished the meal exhibited new strength, and those who had only snuffed its effluvia⁵ confessed themselves regaled. The evening was employed in drying and smoking what remained for future use. The night was a scene of distressing fears to me, and my extreme weakness had affected my mind to such a degree that every difficulty appeared doubly terrible. By the assistance of Scoggin,⁶ I had been ² my child Johnson was in a late stage of pregnancy when she was taken, and her baby was born during the journey.

¹ punck Tinder.

³ effluvia Unpleasant smell.

⁴ Scoggin Name of the horse.

¹ quarters Mercy.

² twenty roods Almost 14 miles.

brought so far, yet so great was my debility, that every hour I was taken off and laid on the ground, to keep me from expiring. But now, alas! this conveyance was no more. To walk it was impossible. Inevitable death in the midst of woods one hundred miles wide appeared to be my only portion.

from CHAPTER 3

In the morning of the sixth day, the Indians exerted themselves to prepare one of their greatest dainties. The marrow bones of old Scoggin were pounded for a soup, and every root, both sweet and bitter, that the woods afforded was thrown in to give it a flavour. Each one partook of as much as his feelings would allow. The war whoop then resounded, with an infernal yell, and we began to fix for a march. My fate was unknown till my master brought some bark and tied my petticoats as high as he supposed would be convenient for walking, and ordered me to “munch.”¹ With scarce strength to stand alone, I went on half a mile with my little son and three Indians. The rest were advanced. My power to move then failed, the world grew dark, and I dropped down. I had sight enough to see an Indian lift his hatchet over my head, while my son screamed, “Ma’am do go, for they will kill you!” As I fainted, my last thought was that I should presently be in a world of spirits. When I awoke, my master was talking angrily with the savage who had threatened my life. By his gestures, I could learn that he charged him with not acting the honourable part of a warrior, by an attempt to destroy the prize of a brother. A whoop was given for the halt. My master helped me to the rest of the company, where a council was held, the result of which was that my husband should walk by my side and help me along. . . .

from CHAPTER 4

Whenever the warriors return from an excursion against an enemy, their return to the tribe or village must be designated by warlike ceremonial; the captives or spoil which may happen to crown their valour must be conducted in triumphant form and decorated to every possible advantage. For this end, we must now submit munch March, pronounced with an accent.

to painting; their vermilion,² with which they were ever supplied, was mixed with bear’s grease, and every cheek, chin, and forehead must have a dash. We then rowed on within a mile of the town, where we stopped at a French house to dine; the prisoners were served with soup meagre³ and bread. After dinner, two savages proceeded to the village to carry the glad tidings of our arrival. The whole atmosphere soon resounded from every quarter, with whoops, yells, shrieks, and screams. St. Francis, from the noise that came from it, might be supposed the centre of Pandemonium.⁴ Our masters were not backward, they made every response they possibly could. The whole time we were sailing from the French house, the noise was direful to be heard. Two hours before sunset, we came to the landing at the village. No sooner had we landed than the yelling in the town was redoubled, and a cloud of savages of all sizes and sexes soon appeared running towards us; when they reached the boats, they formed themselves into a long parade, leaving a small space through which we must pass. Each Indian took his prisoner by the hand, and after ordering him to sing the war-song, began to march through the gauntlet. We expected a severe beating before we got through, but were agreeably disappointed when we found that each Indian only gave us a tap on the shoulder. We were led directly into the houses, each taking his prisoner to his own wigwam. . . . My new home was not the most agreeable; a large wigwam without a floor, with a fire in the centre, and only a few water vessels and dishes to eat from made of birch bark, and tools for cookery, made clumsily of wood, for furniture,⁵ will not be thought a pleasing residence for one accustomed to civilized life.

from CHAPTER 5

Hasty pudding was presently brought forward for supper. A spacious bowl of wood, well filled, was placed in a central spot, and each one drew near with a wooden spoon. As the Indians never use seats, nor have any in their wigwams, my awkwardness in taking my position was a matter of no small amusement to my new com-

² vermilion Bright red pigment.

³ soup meagre Green vegetable soup.

⁴ Pandemonium Capital of Hell in Milton’s Paradise Lost.

⁵ furniture Equipment.

panions. The squaws first fall upon their knees and then sit back upon their heels. This was a posture that I could not imitate. To sit in any other was thought by them indelicate and unpolite. But I advanced to my pudding with the best grace I could, not, however, escaping some of their funny remarks. When the hour for sleep came on (for it would be improper to call it bedtime, where beds were not) I was pointed to a platform, raised half a yard, where, upon a board covered with a blanket, I was to pass the night. The Indians threw themselves down in various parts of the building in a manner that more resembled cows in a shed than human beings in a house....

It was now the 15th day of October. Forty-five days had passed since my captivity, and no prospect but what was darkened with clouds of misfortune. The uneasiness occasioned by indolence¹ was in some measure relieved by the privilege of making shirts for my brother.² At night and morn, I was allowed to milk the cows. The rest of the time I strolled gloomily about, looking sometimes into an unsociable wigwam, at others sauntering into the bushes, and walking on the banks of brooks. Once I went to a French house three miles distant to visit some friends of my brother's family, where I was entertained politely a week. At another time I went with a party to fish, accompanied by a number of squaws. My weakness obliged me to rest often, which gave my companions a poor opinion of me; but they showed no other resentment than calling me "no good squaw," which was the only reproach my sister ever gave when I displeased her. All the French inhabitants I formed an acquaintance with treated me with that civility which distinguishes the nation; once in particular, being almost distracted with an aching tooth, I was carried to a French physician across the river for relief. They prevailed on the Indians to let me visit them a day or two, during which time their marked attention and generosity claim my warmest gratitude. At parting, they expressed their earnest wishes to have me visit them again.

St. Francis contained about thirty wigwams, which were thrown disorderly into a clump. There was a church, in which mass was held every night and morning, and every Sunday; the hearers were summoned by a bell; and attendance was pretty general. Ceremonies were performed by a French friar, who lived in the midst of them for the salvation of their souls. He appeared to be in that place what the legislative branch is in civil governments, and the grand sachem the executive. The inhabitants lived in perfect harmony, holding most of their property in common. They were prone to indolence when at home, and not remarkable for neatness. They were extremely modest and apparently averse to airs of courtship. Necessity was the only thing that called them to action; this induced them to plant their corn and to undergo the fatigues of hunting. Perhaps I am wrong in calling necessity the only motive; revenge, which prompts them to war, has great power. I had a numerous retinue of relations, which I visited daily; but my brother's house being one of the most decent in the village, I fared full as well at home. Among my connections was a little brother Sabaties, who brought the cows for me, and took particular notice of my child. He was a sprightly little fellow, and often amused me with feats performed with his bow and arrow....

In justice to the Indians, I ought to remark that they never treated me with cruelty to a wanton degree: few people have survived a situation like mine, and few have fallen into the savages disposed to more lenity and patience. Modesty has ever been a characteristic of every savage tribe, a truth which the whole of my family will join to corroborate to the extent of their knowledge. As they are aptly called the children of nature, those who have profited by refinement and education ought to abate part of the prejudice which prompts them to look with an eye of censure on this untutored race. Can it be said of civilized conquerors that they in the main are willing to share with their prisoners the last ration of food when famine stares them in the face? Do they ever adopt an enemy and salute him by the tender name of brother? And I am justified in doubting whether, if I had fallen into the hands of French soldiery, so much assiduity³ would have been shown to preserve my life.

¹ indolence Idleness.

² my brother The Abenaki family holding Johnson captive has adopted her.

³ assiduity Concerted attention.

American Independence from Edmund Burke, "Speech on Conciliation with the Colonies" (22 March 1775)

One English writer and politician very largely sympathetic to the cause of the American colonies in the 1770s was the Irish-born British politician Edmund Burke—later to become a prominent opponent of the French Revolution. Burke's approach took the continuity of history and circumstance into account at least as much as it did abstract principles. As these excerpts from an influential 1775 speech indicate, Burke saw the cause of the American colonies as emerging naturally from their English traditions; in contrast, he saw the French Revolution as a violent rupture with the past.¹

... I have in my hand two accounts: one a comparative state of the export trade of England to its colonies, as it stood in the year 1704, and as it stood in the year 1772; the other a state of the export trade of this country to its colonies alone, as it stood in 1772, compared with the whole trade of England to all parts of the world (the colonies included) in the year 1704. ...

The export trade to the colonies consists of three great branches: the African—which, terminating almost wholly in the colonies, must be put to the account of their commerce—the West Indian, and the North American. All these are so interwoven that the attempt to separate them would tear to pieces the contexture of the whole, and, if not entirely destroy, would very much depreciate the value of all the parts. I therefore consider these three denominations to be, what in effect they are, one trade.

The trade to the colonies, taken on the export side, at the beginning of this century, that is, in the year 1704, stood thus:—

Exports to North America and the West Indies.	£483,265
To Africa.	£86,665
	£569,930

¹ French Revolution... the past For Burke's and other opinions on the French Revolution, see "Contexts: The French Revolution and the Napoleonic Era" (in the online component of this anthology, volume 4).

In the year 1772, which I take as a middle year between the highest and lowest of those lately laid on your table, the account was as follows:—

To North America and the West Indies.	£4,791,734
To Africa.	£866,398
To which, if you add the export trade from Scotland, which had in 1704 no existence.	£364,000
	£6,022,132

From five hundred and odd thousand, it has grown to six millions. It has increased no less than twelve-fold. ... But this is not all. Examine my second account. See how the export trade to the colonies alone in 1772 stood in the other point of view; that is, as compared to the whole trade of England in 1704:—

The whole export trade of England, including that to the colonies, in 1704.	£6,509,000
Export to the colonies alone, in 1772.	£6,024,000
Difference.	£485,000

The trade with America alone is now within less than £500,000 of being equal to what this great commercial nation, England, carried on at the beginning of this century with the whole world! ...

America, gentlemen say, is a noble object. It is an object well worth fighting for. Certainly it is, if fighting a people be the best way of gaining them. Gentlemen in this respect will be led to their choice of means by their complexions² and their habits. Those who understand the military art will of course have some predilection for it. Those who wield the thunder of the state may have more confidence in the efficacy of arms. But I confess, possibly for want of this knowledge, my opinion is much more in favour of prudent management than of force; considering force not as an odious, but a feeble instrument for preserving a people so numerous, so active, so growing, so spirited as this, in a profitable and subordinate connection with us.

First, Sir, permit me to observe that the use of force alone is but temporary. It may subdue for a moment, but it does not remove the necessity of subduing again; and a nation is not governed which is perpetually to be conquered.

² complexions Personal attitudes.

My next objection is its uncertainty. Terror is not always the effect of force, and an armament is not a victory. If you do not succeed, you are without resource; for, conciliation failing, force remains; but, force failing, no further hope of reconciliation is left. Power and authority are sometimes bought by kindness; but they can never be begged as alms by an impoverished and defeated violence.

A further objection to force is that you impair the object by your very endeavors to preserve it. The thing you fought for is not the thing which you recover; but depreciated, sunk, wasted, and consumed in the contest. Nothing less will content me than whole America. I do not choose to consume its strength along with our own, because in all parts it is the British strength that I consume. I do not choose to be caught by a foreign enemy at the end of this exhausting conflict, and still less in the midst of it. I may escape; but I can make no insurance against such an event. Let me add, that I do not choose wholly to break the American spirit, because it is the spirit that has made the country.

Lastly, we have no sort of experience in favour of force as an instrument in the rule of our colonies. Their growth and their utility has been owing to methods altogether different. Our ancient indulgence has been said to be pursued to a fault. It may be so. But we know, if feeling is evidence, that our fault was more tolerable than our attempt to mend it; and our sin far more salutary¹ than our penitence.

These, Sir, are my reasons for not entertaining that high opinion of untried force by which many gentlemen, for whose sentiments in other particulars I have great respect, seem to be so greatly captivated. But there is still behind a third consideration concerning this object which serves to determine my opinion on the sort of policy which ought to be pursued in the management of America, even more than its population and its commerce—I mean its temper and character.

In this character of the Americans, a love of freedom is the predominating feature which marks and distinguishes the whole; and as an ardent is always a jealous affection, your colonies become suspicious, restive, and untractable² whenever they see the least attempt to wrest from them by force, or shuffle from them by chicane,³ what they think the only advantage worth living for. This fierce spirit of liberty is stronger in the English colonies probably than in any other people of the earth, and this from a great variety of powerful causes; which, to understand the true temper of their minds and the direction which this spirit takes, it will not be amiss to lay open somewhat more largely.

First, the people of the colonies are descendants of Englishmen. England, Sir, is a nation which still, I hope, respects, and formerly adored, her freedom. The colonists emigrated from you when this part of your character was most predominant, and they took this bias and direction the moment they parted from your hands. They are therefore not only devoted to liberty, but to liberty according to English ideas and on English principles. Abstract liberty, like other mere abstractions, is not to be found. Liberty inheres in some sensible object; and every nation has formed to itself some favorite point, which by way of eminence becomes the criterion of their happiness. It happened, you know, Sir, that the great contests for freedom in this country were from the earliest times chiefly upon the question of taxing. . . . The colonies draw from [England], as with their life-blood, these ideas and principles. Their love of liberty, as with you, fixed and attached on this specific point of taxing. Liberty might be safe, or might be endangered, in twenty other particulars, without their being much pleased or alarmed. Here they felt its pulse; and as they found that beat, they thought themselves sick or sound. I do not say whether they were right or wrong in applying your general arguments to their own case. It is not easy, indeed, to make a monopoly of theorems and corollaries.⁴ The fact is that they did thus apply those general arguments; and your mode of governing them, whether through lenity or indolence,⁵ through wisdom or mistake, confirmed them in the

¹ untractable Difficult to manage.

² chicane Deceit.

³ theorems and corollaries Established propositions and what can be reasoned from them.

⁴ indolence Laziness.

imagination that they, as well as you, had an interest in these common principles.

...

The Americans will have no interest contrary to the grandeur and glory of England when they are not oppressed by the weight of it; and they will rather be inclined to respect the acts of a superintending legislature when they see them the acts of that power which is itself the security, not the rival, of their secondary importance. In this assurance my mind most perfectly acquiesces, and I confess I feel not the least alarm from the discontents which are to arise from putting people at their ease, nor do I apprehend the destruction of this empire from giving, by an act of free grace and indulgence, to two millions of my fellow-citizens some share of those rights upon which I have always been taught to value myself. . . .

from Benjamin Franklin,¹ The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin (1793)

Benjamin Franklin was a remarkable polymath—in addition to playing a major political role in the American Revolution, he was also a successful book printer, author, inventor, and scientist, among other things. Instrumental in the foundation of the United States, he was also influential in Europe; he acted as a negotiator with the British government and as a diplomat to France, where he was hugely popular. In the following excerpt from his Autobiography, he describes a journey to England at the beginning of the Revolution; fighting had just begun when his ship left the American coast.

The Assembly finally, finding the proprietaries² obstinately persisted in manacling their deputies with instructions inconsistent not only with the privileges of the people, but with the service of the Crown, resolved to petition the king against them, and appointed me their agent to go over to England, to present and support the petition. . . .

¹ from Benjamin Franklin Further selections from Franklin are available in the website component of this anthology.

² the proprietaries The Penn family, which had been granted governing rights to Pennsylvania by royal charter.

In the morning it was found by the soundings, &c., that we were near our port, but a thick fog hid the land from our sight. About nine o'clock the fog began to rise, and seemed to be lifted up from the water like the curtain at a play-house, discovering underneath the town of Falmouth, the vessels in its harbor, and the fields that surrounded it. A most pleasing spectacle to those who had been so long without any other prospects than the uniform view of a vacant ocean! And it gave us the more pleasure as we were now free from the anxieties which the state of war occasioned.

I set out immediately, with my son, for London, and we only stopped a little by the way to view Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain, and Lord Pembroke's house and gardens, with his very curious antiquities at Wilton.³

We arrived in London the 27th of July, 1775. As soon as I was settled in a lodging Mr. Charles had provided for me, I went to visit Dr. Fothergill, to whom I was strongly recommended, and whose counsel respecting my proceedings I was advised to obtain. He was against an immediate complaint to government, and thought the proprietaries should first be personally applied to, who might possibly be induced by the interposition and persuasion of some private friends to accommodate matters amicably. I then waited on my old friend and correspondent Mr. Peter Collinson, who told me that John Hanbury, the great Virginia merchant, had requested to be informed when I should arrive, that he might carry me to Lord Granville's, who was then President of the Council, and wished to see me as soon as possible. I agreed to go with him the next morning. Accordingly Mr. Hanbury called for me and took me in his carriage to that nobleman's, who received me with great civility; and after some questions respecting the present state of affairs in America and discourse thereupon, he said to me: "You Americans have wrong ideas of the nature of your constitution; you contend that the king's instructions to his governors are not laws, and think yourselves at liberty to regard or disregard them at your own discretion. But those instructions are not like the pocket instructions given to a minister going abroad, for regulating his conduct in some trifling point of ceremony. They are first drawn up by judges learned in the laws; they are then considered, debated, and perhaps amended in Council, after which they are signed by the king. They are then, so far as relates to you, the law of the land, for THE KING IS THE LEGISLATOR OF THE COLONIES.” I told his lordship this was new doctrine to me. I had always understood from our charters that our laws were to be made by our Assemblies, to be presented indeed to the king for his royal assent, but that being once given the king could not repeal or alter them. And as the Assemblies could not make permanent laws without his assent, so neither could he make a law for them without theirs. He assured me I was totally mistaken. I did not think so, however. And his lordship’s conversation having a little alarmed me as to what might be the sentiments of the Court concerning us, I wrote it down as soon as I returned to my lodgings. I recollected that about 20 years before, a clause in a bill brought into Parliament by the ministry had proposed to make the king’s instructions laws in the colonies, but the clause was thrown out by the Commons, for which we adored them as our friends and friends of liberty, till by their conduct towards us in 1765 it seemed that they had refused that point of sovereignty to the king only that they might reserve it for themselves.

³ Lord Pembroke ... Wilton Wilton, the seat of the Earls of Pembroke, was (and is) renowned as a beautiful country estate.

Thomas Jefferson, “A Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress Assembled”¹ (1776)

The American Revolutionary War had already begun when the Second Continental Congress, an assembly of delegates from the Thirteen Colonies, gathered to perform the functions of government, orchestrating the conduct of the war and the confederation of the colonies as a nation independent from the British Empire. Needing to provide an official explanation for the decision to sever allegiances to Great Britain, Congress appointed a committee of five people—including Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, and John Adams—to draft a Declaration of Independence enumerating the American grievances against the Crown and the ideological justifications for rejecting British rule. The draft was edited by Congress and then immediately printed and distributed throughout the colonies; one copy was sent to England.

The following text is the first complete draft of the Declaration, written by Thomas Jefferson and incorporating changes by other members of the drafting committee; it differs in a few major and many minor respects from the version that Congress eventually adopted. These changes highlight some of the tensions in America over the ideological content of the Declaration; for example, Congress altered Jefferson’s expressions of disappointment in the British Empire and completely removed a paragraph relating to slavery. The most significant differences between the draft and final versions are indicated below in footnotes.

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for a people to advance from that subordination in which they have hitherto remained,² and to assume among the powers of the earth the equal and independent station to which the laws of nature and of nature’s God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the change.

We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal and independent; that from that equal creation they derive rights inherent and inalienable, among which are the preservation of life, and liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;³ that to secure these ends, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government shall become destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its power in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence indeed will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes: and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, begun at a distinguished period, and pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them to absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government and to provide new guards for future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of the colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to expunge their former systems of government. The history of his present majesty¹ is a history of unremitting injuries and usurpations, among which no one fact stands single or solitary to contradict the uniform tenor of the rest,² all of which have in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world, for the truth of which we pledge a faith yet unsullied by falsehood.³

² to advance ... hitherto remained The final version reads “to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another.”

³ created equal ... of happiness The final version reads “created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.”

¹ A Declaration ... Congress Assembled The final version is titled “The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen united States of America.”

He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has neglected utterly to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.⁴

¹ his present majesty The final version reads "the present King of Great Britain."

among which ... the rest These words are removed from the final version.

² for the truth ... by falsehood These words are removed from the final version.

³ He has refused ... tyrants only In 1774, the elected government of the province of Quebec was replaced with an appointed one, and the new government refused to pass important laws until the people of Quebec stopped agitating for a return to the representative system. Similar changes were made to the government of Massachusetts; tyrants only In the final version, here is added the following complaint: "He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures." As retribution for the Boston Tea Party, the

He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly and continually, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people:

He has refused for a long time after such dissolutions to cause others to be elected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise,⁵ the state remaining in the meantime exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without and convulsions within:

He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization for foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither; and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands:⁶

He has suffered the administration of justice totally to cease in some of these colonies,⁷ refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers:

He has made our judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices and amount of their salaries:

He has erected a multitude of new offices by a self-assumed power,⁸ and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance:

He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies and ships of war:⁹

He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power.¹⁰

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws:

governor of Massachusetts forced its assembly to move to Salem, but kept the public records in Boston.

the legislative ... their exercise I.e., because the people's right to good laws cannot be extinguished, but the government is prevented from exercising it on their behalf, the people are justified in undertaking government for themselves.

⁶ raising the conditions ... of lands I.e., making it more difficult for new immigrants to obtain frontier land, thus discouraging immigration.

⁷ suffered the ... these colonies The final version reads "obstructed the administration of justice, by."

⁸ by a self-assumed power These words are removed from the final version.

⁹ and ships of war The final version reads "without the consent of our legislatures."

¹⁰ He has affected ... civil power By an order of the King, the power of the military commander-in-chief for the colonies superseded the power of all civil government in America.

edged by our laws; giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us;
For protecting them by a mock-trial from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states;

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world;
For imposing taxes on us without our consent;
For depriving us of the benefits of trial by jury;
For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses;¹

For taking away our charters,² and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments;

For suspending our own legislatures and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever:

He has abdicated government here, withdrawing his governors, and declaring us out of his allegiance and protection:³

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns and destroyed the lives of our people:

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries⁴ to complete the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy unworthy the head⁵ of a civilized nation:

He has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions of existence:

He has incited treasonable insurrections in our fellow-citizens, with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation of our property:⁶

He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the CHRISTIAN king of Great Britain. Determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce:⁷ and that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished dye,⁸ he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us,⁹ and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them: thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another.¹⁰

In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered by repeated injury. A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may ¹ For transporting ... pretended offenses A 1774 Massachusetts bill entitled the magistrate to send accused criminals to England to be tried; of course, before the trial occurred, it could not be determined whether a transported prisoner was innocent or guilty; pretended offenses Here, the following complaint is added in the final version: "For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighbouring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies." The 1774 changes to the government of Quebec were seen as a means to appease the powerful Catholics there, in order to ensure the province's military allegiance in case of an American rebellion.

² our charters In the final version, here is added "abolishing our most valuable laws."

³ withdrawing his ... and protection The final version reads "by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us."

⁴ foreign mercenaries The British hired many thousands of German soldiers to help fight the American rebels.

⁵ unworthy the head The final version reads "scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head."

⁶ He has endeavoured ... our property The final version reads:

"He has constrained our fellow citizens taken captive on the high seas to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands."

"He has excited domestic insurrections among us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions."

⁷ prostituted his ... execrable commerce The king had vetoed resolutions against the slave trade—primarily at the insistence of slave-owners in the southern colonies.

⁸ want no ... distinguished dye I.e., lack no equally reprehensible element.

⁹ he is now ... among us The British government offered freedom to slaves who escaped their rebel masters and joined the war on the British side.

¹⁰ He has waged ... of another This paragraph does not appear in the final version.

define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a people who mean to be free.¹ Future ages will scarce believe that the hardness of one man adventured, within the short compass of twelve years only, on so many acts of tyranny without a mask, over a people fostered and fixed in principles of liberty.²

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend a jurisdiction over these our states.³ We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here, no one of which could warrant so strange a pretension:⁴ that these were effected at the expense of our own blood and treasure, unassisted by the wealth or the strength of Great Britain: that in constituting indeed our several forms of government, we had adopted one common king, thereby laying a foundation for perpetual league and amity with them: but that submission to their parliament was no part of our constitution, nor ever in idea, if history may be credited: and⁵ we appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, as well as to the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations which were likely to⁶ interrupt our correspondence and connection. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity,⁷ and when occasions have been given them, by the regular course of their laws, of removing from their councils the disturbers of our harmony, they have by their free election re-established them in power. At this very time too they are permitting their chief magistrate to send over not only soldiers of our common blood, but Scotch and foreign mercenaries to invade and deluge us in blood. These facts have given the last stab to agonizing affection, and manly spirit bids us to renounce forever these unfeeling brethren. We must endeavour to forget our former love for them, and to hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends. We might have been a free and a great people together; but a communication of grandeur and of freedom it seems is below their dignity. Be it so, since they will have it; the road to happiness and to glory is open to us too; we will climb it apart from them, and acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our eternal separation!⁸

We therefore the representatives of the United States of America in General Congress assembled⁹ do, in the name and by authority of the good people of these states, reject and renounce all allegiance and subjection to the kings of Great Britain and all others who may hereafter claim by, through, or under them; we utterly dissolve and break off all political connection which may have heretofore subsisted between us and the people or parliament of Great Britain; and finally we do assert and declare these colonies to be free and independent states,¹⁰ and that as free and independent states they shall hereafter¹¹ have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration¹² we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour.

¹ a people ... be free The final version reads: "a free people."

Future ages ... of liberty This sentence does not appear in the final version.

³ a jurisdiction ... our states The final version reads: "an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us."

so strange a pretension I.e., the notion that the people of the Thirteen Colonies were subject to the English Parliament as opposed to their own.

no one of which ... credited; and These words do not appear in the final version.

were likely to The final version reads: "would inevitably."

consanguinity Commonality of blood.

⁸ and when occasions ... eternal separation The final version reads: "We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends."

⁹ assembled In the final version, here is added "appealing to the supreme judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions."

¹⁰ of these states ... independent states The final version reads: "of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved."

¹¹ shall hereafter These words do not appear in the final version.

¹² declaration In the final version, here is added "with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence."

from Thomas Paine, The American Crisis (1777)

Born in England, Thomas Paine immigrated to the Thirteen Colonies in 1774 and became a citizen of Pennsylvania just in time for the beginning of the Revolutionary War. His bestselling pamphlets Common Sense and The American Crisis were hugely important in exciting public opinion in support of the war. He later returned to England, where he wrote Rights of Man in support of the French Revolution.¹

NUMBER 1

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country, but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly; 'tis dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to set a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed, if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated. Britain, with an army to enforce her tyranny, has declared, that she has a right (not only to tax) but "to bind us in all cases whatsoever,"² and if being bound in that manner is not slavery, then is there not such a thing as slavery upon earth. Even the expression is impious, for so unlimited a power can belong only to GOD.

Whether the independence of the Continent was declared too soon, or delayed too long, I will not now enter into as an argument; my own simple opinion is that had it been eight months earlier, it would have been much better. We did not make a proper use of last winter, neither could we, while we were in a dependent state. However, the fault, if it were one, was all our own; we have none to blame but ourselves. But no great deal is lost yet; all that Howe³ has been doing for this month past is rather a ravage than a conquest, which the spirit of the Jersies⁴ a year ago would have quickly repulsed, and which time and a little resolution will soon recover.

I have as little superstition in me as any man living, but my secret opinion has ever been, and still is, that GOD almighty will not give up a people to military destruction, or leave them unsupported to perish, who had so earnestly and so repeatedly sought to avoid the calamities of war by every decent method which wisdom could invent. Neither have I so much of the infidel in me as to suppose that He has relinquished the government of the world, and given us up to the care of devils; and as I do not, I cannot see on what grounds the king of Britain can look up to Heaven for help against us: a common murderer, a highwayman, or a housebreaker, has as good a pretence as he.

from Richard Price, Observations on the Importance of the American Revolution (1785)

OF THE IMPORTANCE OF THE REVOLUTION WHICH HAS ESTABLISHED THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE UNITED STATES

Having, from pure conviction, taken a warm part in favour of the British colonies (now the United States of America) during the late war and been exposed, in consequence of this, to much abuse and some danger, it must be supposed that I have been waiting for the issue⁵ with anxiety. I am thankful that my anxiety is removed and that I have been spared to be a witness to that very issue of the war which has been all along the object of my wishes. With heartfelt satisfaction I see the revolution in favour of universal liberty which has taken place in America, a revolution which opens a new prospect in human affairs and begins a new era in the history of mankind, a revolution by which Britons themselves will be the greatest gainers, if wise enough to improve properly the check that

¹ Rights of ... Revolution See Paine's Rights of Man, excerpted in the online component of this anthology, volume 4.

² to bind ... whatsoever Reference to a statement made in the Declaratory Act (1766): "[the British government] had, hath, and of right ought to have, full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the colonies and people of America, subjects of the crown of Great Britain, in all cases whatsoever."

³ Howe Sir William Howe (1729–1814), commander of the British forces during the War of Independence.

⁴ Jersies Colonies of East and West Jersey; Paine is referring to Washington's successful surprise attack on Christmas Day of the previous year.

⁵ issue I.e., the resolution of the conflict.

John Singleton Copley, The Death of Major Peirson, 6 January 1781 (1783). France provided unofficial assistance to the Americans from the beginning of the Revolutionary War, but by the end of the war it was openly fighting against the English, as were Spain and the Dutch Republic. Battles related to the Revolutionary War occurred in India, the West Indies, and even in Europe; this painting depicts the results of a battle on the island of Jersey, a British possession off the coast of France. The governor of Jersey surrendered after an attack by the French, but British major Francis Peirson refused to accept the surrender and organized the defeat of the French forces. He died early in the battle and never learned of his success, but this painting depicts him dying at the moment of victory. The artist, John Singleton Copley, was born in New England and painted portraits there before immigrating to England, where he painted this and other historical works. (See the color insert in this volume for another important example.)

has been given to the despotism of their ministers, and to catch the flame of virtuous liberty which has saved their American brethren.

The late war, in its commencement and progress, did great good by disseminating just sentiments of the rights of mankind and the nature of legitimate government, by exciting a spirit of resistance to tyranny which has emancipated one European country and is likely to emancipate others, and by occasioning the establishment in America of forms of government more equitable and more liberal than any that the world has yet known. But, in its termination, the war has done still greater good by preserving the new governments from that destruction in which they must have been involved, had Britain conquered, by providing, in a sequestered continent possessed of many singular advantages, a place of refuge for oppressed men in every region of the world, and by laying the foundation there of an empire which may be the seat of liberty, science and virtue, and from whence there is reason to hope these sacred blessings will spread till they become universal and the time arrives when kings and priests shall have no more power to oppress, and that ignominious slavery which has hitherto debased the world exterminated. I therefore think I see the hand of providence in the late war working for the general good.

Reason, as well as tradition and revelation, lead us to expect that a more improved and happy state of human affairs will take place before the consummation of all things.¹ The world has hitherto been gradually improving. Light and knowledge have been gaining ground, and human life at present, compared with what it once was, is much the same that a youth approaching to manhood is compared with an infant....

OF THE NEGRO TRADE AND SLAVERY

The negro trade cannot be censured in language too severe. It is a traffic which, as it has been hitherto carried on, is shocking to humanity, cruel, wicked, and diabolical.

I am happy to find that the United States are entering into measures for discountenancing² it and for abolishing the odious slavery which it has introduced. Till they have done this, it will not appear they deserve the liberty for which they have been contending. For it is self-evident that if there are any men whom they have a right to hold in slavery, there may be others who have had a right to hold them in slavery. I am sensible, however, that this is a work which they cannot accomplish at once. The emancipation of the negroes must, I suppose, be left in some measure to be the effect of time and of manners. But nothing can excuse the United States if it is not done with as much speed, and at the same time with as much effect, as their particular circumstances and situation will allow. I rejoice that on this occasion I can recommend to them the example of my own country. In Britain, a negro becomes a freeman the moment he sets his foot on British ground.³

² discountenancing Discouraging.

³ In Britain ... British ground Reference to a 1772 court ruling (Somerset's Case) that effectively outlawed the keeping of slaves in England. English people, however, continued to own slaves in other parts of the British Empire.

¹ consummation of all things End of the world as foretold in the Bible.

WILLIAM COWPER

1731 – 1800

William Cowper (pronounced Cooper) had an enormous readership during his generation, even though he spent most of his life in seclusion in the countryside, where he wrote the poems and letters for which he is best remembered. The inspiration for his best-known work came from his friend Lady Austen. When Cowper complained to her that he had nothing to write about, she suggested that he compose a poem in blank verse about his sofa. “The Sofa” did indeed become Book I of The Task (1785), engendering an extended work that is almost epic in its breadth of subject matter and style (while its domestic focus and absence of narrative are the very reverse of epic). The Task comprises six books, beginning with a playful narrative about the evolution of furniture, written in mock-heroic, Miltonic style. It moves on to myriad other subjects, including a meditation on the immorality of slavery (a subject about which the author felt passionately) and an extended celebration of domestic and rural life. Cowper is at his finest when meditating upon the significance of commonplace items and the details of lush, pastoral scenes, using unadorned language that has sometimes been said to foreshadow the style of the later Romantics. Indeed, Samuel Taylor Coleridge called Cowper “the best modern poet.” In addition to The Task, he remains known for his varied range of short poems, for his comic narrative “The Diverting History of John Gilpin,” and for the astonishing contrasts between his outwardly ordinary life and his inner despair.

Cowper was born in Berkampstead, Hertfordshire, to the Reverend John Cowper and Ann Donne, whose family claimed a kinship with the poet John Donne. She died when Cowper was only six, and he believed that his later problems with depression stemmed partly from this premature loss. Cowper's early difficulties were aggravated by the relentless bullying he suffered at the hands of his schoolmates in school. He eventually studied law, a profession ill-suited to him and which he never practiced. When a relative tried to help him procure a position as Clerk of the Journals in the House of Lords, Cowper was thrown into terror at the prospect of the interview he would be required to attend. This caused his first suicide attempt, upon which he was incarcerated in an asylum. During this period Cowper wrote “Lines Written During a Period of Insanity,” which describes his growing fear of the wrath of God for the “sin” he had committed against the Holy Ghost: “Him [Satan] the vindictive rod of angry justice / Sent quick and howling to the centre headlong; / I, fed with judgement, in a fleshly tomb, am / Buried above ground.” Although Cowper would eventually find some respite from his despair upon his conversion to Evangelicalism, when he lost his first ecstatic religious feelings he was convinced he was damned, and his despondency returned, increased.

In 1765 Cowper moved to the home of Reverend Morley and Mary Unwin in Huntingdon. After Morley Unwin died two years later, Cowper moved with Mary and her children to Olney; he lived with her for the rest of his life. He wrote two famous paeans to Mary—“My Mary” and “To Mary Unwin”; she in turn devotedly nursed him through his depressions and encouraged his literary work. In Olney he came under the influence of John Newton, a fiery Evangelical preacher and ex-slave trader, who helped stoke his religious angst. During the period in which Cowper was still under Newton's sway, the two co-authored the hauntingly beautiful Olney Hymns (written in 1771–72 and published in 1779), which include Newton's "Amazing Grace" and Cowper's "Oh for a closer walk with God" and "God moves in a mysterious way."

Although he spent his years in Olney and later in Weston Underwood in isolation, Cowper became one of the most celebrated poets of his time. His 1782 volume Poems by William Cowper, of the Inner Temple, Esq., which included eight satires, was received with great enthusiasm, ironically enough, for its "cheerfulness of spirit." 1785 saw publication of The Task, Cowper's tour de force, again with a very favorable response (including, it was said, from the Royal Family). His later works include a translation of Homer's The Iliad (1791).

Upon leaving Olney, Cowper continued to write long and evocative letters to friends; these letters have since become famous for their descriptive beauty and the simplicity of their language. Mary Unwin's prolonged illness and her death in 1796 again pushed Cowper to the limits of his sanity, and he spent the remainder of his life as an invalid, dying in 1800. Before he died, though, he wrote "The Castaway," a powerful poem that likens his own situation, in which he expected his soul to perish in damnation, to that of a sailor swept overboard who can see his "floating home" but knows that it is powerless to stop for him and that he will drown. The poem speaks to its author's sense of being cast out from the community of the saved; it has remained one of his best-known works.

Light Shining Out of Darkness

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never failing skill;
He treasures up his bright designs,
And works his Sovereign Will.

Ye fearful Saints fresh courage take,
The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with Mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his Grace;
Behind a frowning Providence,
He hides a smiling face.

His purposes will ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour;

The bud may have a bitter taste,
20 But wait, to smell the flower.

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own Interpreter,
And he will make it plain.

—1772

*The Castaway*¹

Obscurest night involved the sky,
Th' Atlantic billows roared,
When such a destined wretch as I,
Washed headlong from on board,
5 Of friends, of hope, of all bereft,
His floating home forever left.

No braver chief could Albion^o boast
Than he with whom he went,

England

¹ The Castaway Based upon an occurrence documented in Lord George Anson's Voyage Round the World (1748), in which a sailor on Anson's ship was tossed overboard in a fierce storm and could not be rescued.

Nor ever ship left Albion's coast,
 10 With warmer wishes sent.
 He loved them both, but both in vain,
 Nor him beheld, nor her again.

Not long beneath the whelming brine,
 Expert to swim, he lay;
 15 Nor soon he felt his strength decline,
 Or courage die away;
 But waged with death a lasting strife,
 Supported by despair of life.

He shouted; nor his friends had failed
 20 To check the vessel's course,
 But so the furious blast prevailed,
 That, pitiless perforce,
 They left their outcast mate behind,
 And scudded still before the wind.

Some succor yet they could afford;
 And, such as storms allow,
 The cask, the coop,^o the floated cord,^o
 Delayed not to bestow.
 But he (they knew) nor ship, nor shore,
 30 Whate'er they gave, should visit more.

Nor, cruel as it seemed, could he
 Their haste himself condemn,
 Aware that flight, in such a sea,
 Alone could rescue them;
 35 Yet bitter felt it still to die
 Deserted, and his friends so nigh.

He long survives, who lives an hour
 In ocean, self-upheld;
 And so long he, with unspent pow'r,

40 His destiny repelled;
 And ever, as the minutes flew,
 Entreated help, or cried, "Adieu!"

At length, his transient respite past,
 His comrades, who before
 45 Had heard his voice in every blast,
 Could catch the sound no more.
 For then, by toil subdued, he drank
 The stifling wave, and then he sank.

No poet wept him; but the page
 50 Of narrative sincere,
 That tells his name, his worth, his age,
 Is wet with Anson's tear.
 And tears by bards or heroes shed
 Alike immortalize the dead.

55 I therefore purpose not, or dream,
 Descanting on his fate,
 To give the melancholy theme
 A more enduring date:
 But misery still delights to trace
 60 Its semblance in another's case.

No voice divine the storm allayed,¹
 No light propitious shone,
 When, snatched from all effectual aid,
 We perished, each alone;
 65 But I beneath a rougher sea,
 And whelmed in deeper gulfs than he.
 —1803

basket / rope

OLAUDAH EQUIANO OR GUSTAVUS VASSA

1745 – 1797

Olaudah Equiano's The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano was the first slave narrative written in English, and he is viewed by many as the originator of the genre. As such, his work is seen as the beginning of black literary tradition. His narrative became a central document for the abolitionist movement, showing readers the horrors of slavery while also demonstrating the eloquence of a native-born African who had been educated in the Western tradition, and displaying to the devout that black people were as capable of spiritual enlightenment as were whites.

Until recently Equiano's account of his early years was generally taken at face value; it was accepted that he had been born into the Ibo nation; that he had been kidnaped at the age of eleven and enslaved for some time in Africa; and that he was eventually brought across the Atlantic as a slave. In an important 1999 article and then in his 2005 biography of Equiano, historian Vincent Carretta challenged his account, citing two newly-discovered documents indicating that Equiano had been born not in Africa, but in Carolina. The issue may never be entirely resolved, but Carretta's arguments are now widely accepted. It is significant, however, that neither Carretta nor other scholars have challenged the authenticity of the information Equiano provides about life in Africa, the passage across the Atlantic, and so on; if Equiano himself was indeed born an American slave, he would have obtained such information directly from his fellow slaves. At issue, then, is not the fundamental reality of the account Equiano provides, but only whether the early part of his narrative represents a first-hand account or an act of creative imagination based on first-hand research.

Equiano's account of his life following his purchase by the British naval captain Michael Henry Pascal is not in dispute. As a slave to Pascal (who renamed him "Gustavus Vassa") Equiano began his career as a seaman. For the next ten or eleven years, Equiano traveled widely to the Mediterranean, Europe, and the Americas, and was engaged in several battles during the Seven Years' War (1756–63). Despite his years of service, Pascal sold Equiano for £40 to the Quaker Robert King, from whom Equiano was eventually able to buy his freedom in 1766.

After securing his freedom, Equiano settled in England. While slavery was still permitted in England's overseas colonies, it was frowned on at home, and there was a relatively large black population (10,000–20,000). Because he had most often been enslaved to British men, and because he had been baptized into the Anglican Church in 1759, Equiano considered himself "almost an Englishman." He had been taught to read and write while still a slave and he now used these skills to highlight the position of slaves and to petition for the abolition of slavery. He worked with several prominent abolitionists, including Granville Sharpe and William Wilberforce. When his narrative was published in 1789 it was widely read, and it became influential in furthering the abolitionists' cause. Equiano married in 1792 and had two daughters before he died in 1797.

from The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African. Written by Himself

CHAPTER I

The author's account of his country, and their manners and customs—Administration of justice—Embrenche—Marriage ceremony, and public entertainments—Mode of living—Dress—Manufactures Buildings—Commerce—Agriculture—War and religion—Superstition of the natives—Funeral ceremonies of the priests or magicians—Curious mode of discovering poison—Some hints concerning the origin of the author's countrymen, with the opinions of different writers on that subject.

I believe it is difficult for those who publish their own memoirs to escape the imputation of vanity; nor is this the only disadvantage under which they labour: it is also their misfortune that what is uncommon is rarely, if ever, believed, and what is obvious we are apt to turn from with disgust, and to charge the writer with impertinence. People generally think those memoirs only worthy to be read or remembered which abound in great or striking events, those, in short, which in a high degree excite either admiration or pity: all others they consign to contempt and oblivion. It is therefore, I confess, not a little hazardous in a private and obscure individual, and a stranger too, thus to solicit the indulgent attention of the public; especially when I own I offer here the history of neither a saint, a hero, nor a tyrant. I believe there are few events in my life which have not happened to many: it is true the incidents of it are numerous; and, did I consider myself an European, I might say my sufferings were great: but when I compare my lot with that of most of my countrymen, I regard myself as a particular favourite of Heaven, and acknowledge the mercies of Providence in every occurrence of my life. If then the following narrative does not appear sufficiently interesting to engage general attention, let my motive be some excuse for its publication. I am not so foolishly vain as to expect from it either immortality or literary reputation. If it affords any satisfaction to my numerous friends, at whose request it has been written, or in the smallest degree promotes the interests of humanity, the ends for which it was undertaken will be fully attained, and every wish of my heart gratified. Let it therefore be remembered that, in wishing to avoid censure, I do not aspire to praise.

That part of Africa, known by the name of Guinea, to which the trade for slaves is carried on, extends along the coast above 3400 miles, from the Senegal to Angola, and includes a variety of kingdoms. Of these the most considerable is the kingdom of Benin,¹ both as to extent and wealth, the richness and cultivation of the soil, the power of its king, and the number and warlike disposition of the inhabitants. It is situated nearly under the line,² and extends along the coast about 170 miles, but runs back into the interior part of Africa to a distance hitherto I believe unexplored by any traveller; and seems only terminated at length by the empire of Abyssinia, near 1500 miles from its beginning. This kingdom is divided into many provinces or districts: in one of the most remote and fertile of which, called Eboe, I was born, in the year 1745, in a charming fruitful vale named Essaka. The distance of this province from the capital of Benin and the sea coast must be very considerable; for I had never heard of white men or Europeans, nor of the sea. And our subjection to the king of Benin was little more than nominal, for every transaction of the government, as far as my slender observation extended, was conducted by the chiefs or elders of the place. The manners and government of a people who have little commerce with other countries are generally very simple, and the history of what passes in one family or village may serve as a specimen of a nation. My father was one of those elders or chiefs I have spoken of, and was styled Embrenche; a term, as I remember, importing the highest distinction, and signifying in our language a mark of grandeur. This mark is conferred on the person entitled to it by cutting the skin across at the top of the forehead, and drawing it down to the eyebrows; and while it is in this situation applying a warm hand, kingdom of Benin This kingdom extended over part of present-day Nigeria as well as present-day Benin.

² under the line South of the equator.

and rubbing it until it shrinks up into a thick weal¹ across the lower part of the forehead. Most of the judges and senators were thus marked; my father had long borne it. I had seen it conferred on one of my brothers, and I was also destined to receive it by my parents. Those Embrenche, or chief men, decided disputes and punished crimes, for which purpose they always assembled together. The proceedings were generally short, and in most cases the law of retaliation prevailed. I remember a man was brought before my father and the other judges for kidnapping a boy; and, although he was the son of a chief or senator, he was condemned to make recompense by a man or woman slave. Adultery, however, was sometimes punished with slavery or death, a punishment which I believe is inflicted on it throughout most of the nations of Africa, so sacred among them is the honour of the marriage bed, and so jealous are they of the fidelity of their wives. Of this I recollect an instance: a woman was convicted before the judges of adultery, and delivered over, as the custom was, to her husband to be punished. Accordingly he determined to put her to death; but it being found, just before her execution, that she had an infant at her breast; and no woman being prevailed on to perform the part of a nurse, she was spared on account of the child. The men, however, do not preserve the same constancy to their wives which they expect from them; for they indulge in a plurality, though seldom in more than two. Their mode of marriage is thus: both parties are usually betrothed when young by their parents (though I have known the males to betroth themselves). On this occasion a feast is prepared, and the bride and bridegroom stand up in the midst of all their friends, who are assembled for the purpose, while he declares she is thenceforth to be looked upon as his wife, and that no other person is to pay any addresses to her. This is also immediately proclaimed in the vicinity, on which the bride retires from the assembly. Some time after she is brought home to her husband, and then another feast is made, to which the relations of both parties are invited. Her parents then deliver her to the bridegroom, accompanied with a number of blessings, and at the same time they tie round her waist a cotton string of the thickness of a goose-quill, which none but married women are permitted to wear: she is now considered as completely his wife; and at this time the dowry is given to the new married pair, which generally consists of portions of land, slaves, and cattle, household goods, and implements of husbandry. These are offered by the friends of both parties; besides which the parents of the bridegroom present gifts to those of the bride, whose property she is looked upon before marriage; but after it she is esteemed the sole property of her husband. The ceremony being now ended, the festival begins, which is celebrated with bonfires, and loud acclamations of joy, accompanied with music and dancing.

We are almost a nation of dancers, musicians, and poets. Thus every great event, such as a triumphant return from battle or other cause of public rejoicing, is celebrated in public dances, which are accompanied with songs and music suited to the occasion. The assembly is separated into four divisions which dance either apart or in succession, and each with a character peculiar to itself. The first division contains the married men, who in their dances frequently exhibit feats of arms, and the representation of a battle. To these succeed the married women, who dance in the second division. The young men occupy the third; and the maidens the fourth. Each represents some interesting scene of real life, such as a great achievement, domestic employment, a pathetic story, or some rural sport; and as the subject is generally founded on some recent event, it is therefore ever new. This gives our dances a spirit and variety which I have scarcely seen elsewhere.² We have many musical instruments, particularly drums of different kinds, a piece of music which resembles a guitar, and another much like a stickado.³ These last are chiefly used by betrothed virgins, who play on them on all grand festivals.

As our manners are simple, our luxuries are few. The dress of both sexes is nearly the same. It generally consists of a long piece of calico, or muslin, wrapped loosely round the body, somewhat in the form of a highland plaid. This is usually dyed blue, which is our favourite colour. It is extracted from a berry, and is brighter and richer than any I have seen in Europe. Besides this, our women of distinction wear golden ornaments; which they dispose with some profusion on their arms and legs. When our women are not employed with the men in tillage, their usual occupation is spinning and weaving cotton, which they afterwards dye and make it into garments. They also manufacture earthen vessels, of which we have many kinds. Among the rest tobacco pipes, made after the same fashion, and used in the same manner, as those in Turkey.¹

¹ [Equiano's note] When I was in Smyrna I have frequently seen the Greeks dance after this manner.

³ stickado Musical instrument similar to a xylophone.

Our manner of living is entirely plain; for as yet the natives are unacquainted with those refinements in cookery which debauch the taste: bullocks, goats, and poultry supply the greatest part of their food. These constitute likewise the principal wealth of the country, and the chief articles of its commerce. The flesh is usually stewed in a pan; to make it savoury we sometimes use also pepper and other spices, and we have salt made of wood ashes. Our vegetables are mostly plantains, eadas, yams, beans, and Indian corn.² The head of the family usually eats alone; his wives and slaves have also their separate tables. Before we taste food we always wash our hands: indeed our cleanliness on all occasions is extreme; but on this it is an indispensable ceremony. After washing, libation is made by pouring out a small portion of the drink in a certain place, for the spirits of departed relations, which the natives suppose to preside over their conduct and guard them from evil. They are totally unacquainted with strong or spirituous liquours, and their principal beverage is palm wine. This is gotten from a tree of that name by tapping it at the top and fastening a large gourd to it; and sometimes one tree will yield three or four gallons in a night. When just drawn it is of a most delicious sweetness; but in a few days it acquires a tartish and more spirituous flavour, though I never saw any one intoxicated by it. The same tree also produces nuts and oil. Our principal luxury is in perfumes; one sort of these is an odoriferous wood of delicious fragrance; the other a kind of earth, a small portion of which thrown into the fire diffuses a most powerful odour.³ We beat this wood into powder, and mix it with palm oil; with which both men and women perfume themselves.

In our buildings we study convenience rather than ornament. Each master of a family has a large square piece of ground, surrounded with a moat or fence, or enclosed with a wall made of red earth tempered, which, when dry, is as hard as brick. Within this are his houses to accommodate his family and slaves, which, if numerous, frequently present the appearance of a village. In the middle stands the principal building, appropriated to the sole use of the master and consisting of two apartments, in one of which he sits in the day with his family; the other is left apart for the reception of his friends. He has besides these a distinct apartment in which he sleeps, together with his male children. On each side are the apartments of his wives, who have also their separate day and night houses. The habitations of the slaves and their families are distributed throughout the rest of the enclosure. These houses never exceed one story in height; they are always built of wood, or stakes driven into the ground, crossed with wattles and neatly plastered within and without. The roof is thatched with reeds. Our dayhouses are left open at the sides; but those in which we sleep are always covered and plastered in the inside with a composition mixed with cow-dung, to keep off the different insects which annoy us during the night. The walls and floors also of these are generally covered with mats. Our beds consist of a platform, raised three or four feet from the ground, on which are laid skins and different parts of a spongy tree called plantain. Our covering is calico or muslin, the same as our dress. The usual seats are a few logs of wood, but we have benches, which are generally perfumed, to accommodate strangers. These compose the greater part of our household furniture. Houses so constructed and furnished require but little skill to erect them. Every man is a sufficient architect for the purpose. The whole neighbourhood afford their unanimous assistance in building them and in return receive, and expect, no other recompense than a feast.

[Equiano's note] The bowl is earthen, curiously figured, to which a long reed is fixed as a tube. This tube is sometimes so long as to be borne by one, and frequently out of grandeur by two boys.

² Indian corn Maize; corn.

³ [Equiano's note] When I was in Smyrna I saw the same kind of earth, and brought some of it with me to England; it resembles musk in strength, but is more delicious in scent, and is not unlike the smell of a rose.

As we live in a country where nature is prodigal of her favours, our wants are few and easily supplied; of course, we have few manufactures. They consist for the most part of calicoes, earthen ware, ornaments, and instruments of war and husbandry. But these make no part of our commerce, the principal articles of which, as I have observed, are provisions. In such a state money is of little use; however, we have some small pieces of coin, if I may call them such. They are made something like an anchor, but I do not remember either their value or denomination. We have also markets, at which I have been frequently with my mother. These are sometimes visited by stout mahogany-coloured men from the south west of us: we call them Oye-Eboe, which term signifies "red men living at a distance." They generally bring us firearms, gunpowder, hats, beads, and dried fish. The last we esteemed a great rarity, as our waters were only brooks and springs. These articles they barter with us for odoriferous woods and earth, and our salt of wood ashes. They always carry slaves through our land; but the strictest account is exacted of their manner of procuring them before they are suffered to pass. Sometimes indeed we sold slaves to them, but they were only prisoners of war, or such among us as had been convicted of kidnapping, or adultery, and some other crimes which we esteemed heinous. This practice of kidnapping induces me to think that, notwithstanding all our strictness, their principal business among us was to trepan¹ our people. I remember too they carried great sacks along with them, which not long after I had an opportunity of fatally seeing applied to that infamous purpose.

Our land is uncommonly rich and fruitful, and produces all kinds of vegetables in great abundance. We have plenty of Indian corn, and vast quantities of cotton and tobacco. Our pineapples grow without culture; they are about the size of the largest sugar-loaf,² and finely flavoured. We have also spices of different kinds, particularly pepper, and a variety of delicious fruits which I have never seen in Europe, together with gums of various kinds, and honey in abundance. All our industry is exerted to improve those blessings of nature. Agriculture is our chief employment, and everyone, even the children and women, are engaged in it. Thus we are all habituated to labour from our earliest years. Everyone contributes something to the common stock, and as we are unacquainted with idleness, we have no beggars. The benefits of such a mode of living are obvious. The West India planters prefer the slaves of Benin or Eboe to those of any other part of Guinea, for their hardiness, intelligence, integrity, and zeal. Those benefits are felt by us in the general healthiness of the people, and in their vigour and activity; I might have added too in their comeliness.³ Deformity is indeed unknown amongst us—I mean that of shape. Numbers of the natives of Eboe now in London might be brought in support of this assertion: for, in regard to complexion, ideas of beauty are wholly relative. I remember while in Africa to have seen three negro children who were tawny, and another quite white, who were universally regarded by myself and the natives in general, as far as related to their complexions, as deformed. Our women too were in my eyes at least uncommonly graceful, alert, and modest to a degree of bashfulness; nor do I remember to have ever heard of an instance of incontinence⁴ amongst them before marriage. They are also remarkably cheerful. Indeed cheerfulness and affability are two of the leading characteristics of our nation.

Our tillage is exercised in a large plain or common some hours' walk from our dwellings, and all the neighbours resort thither in a body. They use no beasts of husbandry, and their only instruments are hoes, axes, shovels, and beaks, or pointed iron to dig with. Sometimes we are visited by locusts, which come in large clouds, so as to darken the air, and destroy our harvest. This however happens rarely, but when it does, a famine is produced by it. I remember an instance or two wherein this happened. This common is often the theatre of war; and therefore when our people go out to till their land, they not only go in a body, but generally take their arms with them for fear of a surprise; and when they apprehend an invasion they guard the avenue to their dwellings by driving sticks into the ground, which are so sharp at one end as to pierce the foot, and are generally dipped in poison. From what I can recoltrepan Trick.

² sugar-loaf A variety of pineapple popular in England at the time.

³ comeliness Pleasing appearance; beauty of form.

⁴ incontinence Unchastity.

lect of these battles, they appear to have been irruptions¹ of one little state or district on the other, to obtain prisoners or booty. Perhaps they were incited to this by those traders who brought the European goods I mentioned amongst us. Such a mode of obtaining slaves in Africa is common, and I believe more are procured this way, and by kidnapping, than any other.² When a trader wants slaves, he applies to a chief for them, and tempts him with his wares. It is not extraordinary if on this occasion he yields to the temptation with as little firmness and accepts the price of his fellow creatures' liberty with as little reluctance as the enlightened merchant. Accordingly he falls on his neighbours, and a desperate battle ensues. If he prevails and takes prisoners, he gratifies his avarice by selling them; but, if his party be vanquished, and he falls into the hands of the enemy, he is put to death: for, as he has been known to foment³ their quarrels, it is thought dangerous to let him survive, and no ransom can save him, though all other prisoners may be redeemed. We have firearms, bows and arrows, broad two-edged swords and javelins; we have shields also which cover a man from head to foot. All are taught the use of these weapons; even our women are warriors, and march boldly out to fight along with the men. Our whole district is a kind of militia: on a certain signal given, such as the firing of a gun at night, they all rise in arms and rush upon their enemy. It is perhaps something remarkable that when our people march to the field a red flag or banner is borne before them. I was once a witness to a battle in our common. We had been all at work in it one day as usual when our people were suddenly attacked. I climbed a tree at some distance, from which I beheld the fight. There were many women as well as men on both sides; among others my mother was there, and armed with a broad sword. After fighting for a considerable time with great fury, and after many had been killed, our people obtained the victory and took their enemy's chief prisoner. He was carried off in great triumph, and, though he offered a large ransom for his life, he was put to death. A virgin of note among our enemies had been slain in the battle, and her arm was exposed in our market-place, where our trophies were always exhibited. The spoils were divided according to the merit of the warriors. Those prisoners which were not sold or redeemed we kept as slaves: but how different was their condition from that of the slaves in the West Indies! With us they do no more work than other members of the community, even their masters; their food, clothing, and lodging were nearly the same as theirs (except that they were not permitted to eat with those who were free-born), and there was scarce any other difference between them than a superior degree of importance which the head of a family possesses in our state, and that authority which, as such, he exercises over every part of his household. Some of these slaves have even slaves under them as their own property and for their own use.

As to religion, the natives believe that there is one Creator of all things, and that he lives in the sun and is girded round with a belt; that he may never eat or drink; but, according to some, he smokes a pipe, which is our own favourite luxury. They believe he governs events, especially our deaths or captivity; but, as for the doctrine of eternity, I do not remember to have ever heard of it: some however believe in the transmigration of souls in a certain degree. Those spirits which are not transmigrated, such as our dear friends or relations, they believe always attend them and guard them from the bad spirits or their foes. For this reason they always before eating, as I have observed, put some small portion of the meat, and pour some of their drink, on the ground for them; and they often make oblations of the blood of beasts or fowls at their graves. I was very fond of my mother, and almost constantly with her. When she went to make these oblations at her mother's tomb, which was a kind of small solitary thatched house, I sometimes attended her. There she made her libations and spent most of the night in cries and lamentations. I have been often extremely terrified on these occasions. The loneliness of the place, the darkness of the night, and the ceremony of libation, naturally awful and gloomy, were heightened by my mother's lamentations; and these, concurring with the cries of doleful birds by which these places were frequented, gave an inexpressible terror to the scene.

irruptions Invasions.

[Equiano's note] See Benezer's "Account of Africa" throughout.

¹ foment Stir up.

We compute the year from the day on which the sun crosses the line, and on its setting that evening there is a general shout throughout the land—at least, I can speak from my own knowledge, throughout our vicinity. The people at the same time make a great noise with rattles, not unlike the basket rattles used by children here, though much larger, and hold up their hands to heaven for a blessing. It is then the greatest offerings are made, and those children whom our wise men foretell will be fortunate are then presented to different people. I remember many used to come to see me, and I was carried about to others for that purpose. They have many offerings, particularly at full moons, generally two at harvest before the fruits are taken out of the ground; and when any young animals are killed, sometimes they offer up part of them as a sacrifice. These offerings, when made by one of the heads of a family, serve for the whole. I remember we often had them at my father's and my uncle's, and their families have been present. Some of our offerings are eaten with bitter herbs. We had a saying among us to any one of a cross temper, that "if they were to be eaten, they should be eaten with bitter herbs."

We practised circumcision like the Jews, and made offerings and feasts on that occasion in the same manner as they did. Like them also, our children were named from some event, some circumstance or fancied foreboding, at the time of their birth. I was named Olaudah, which, in our language, signifies "vicissitude" or "fortunate," also, one favoured, and having a loud voice and well spoken. I remember we never polluted the name of the object of our adoration; on the contrary, it was always mentioned with the greatest reverence; and we were totally unacquainted with swearing, and all those terms of abuse and reproach which find their way so readily and copiously into the languages of more civilized people. The only expressions of that kind I remember were "May you rot," or "May you swell," or "May a beast take you."

I have before remarked that the natives of this part of Africa are extremely cleanly. This necessary habit of decency was with us a part of religion, and therefore we had many purifications and washings; indeed almost as many and used on the same occasions, if my recollection does not fail me, as the Jews. Those that touched the dead at any time were obliged to wash and purify themselves before they could enter a dwelling-house. Every woman too, at certain times, was forbidden to come into a dwelling-house, or touch any person or any thing we ate. I was so fond of my mother I could not keep from her or avoid touching her at some of those periods, in consequence of which I was obliged to be kept out with her, in a little house made for that purpose, till offering was made, and then we were purified.

Though we had no places of public worship, we had priests and magicians, or wise men. I do not remember whether they had different offices, or whether they were united in the same persons, but they were held in great reverence by the people. They calculated our time and foretold events, as their name imported, for we called them Ah-affoe-way-cah, which signifies "calculators" or "yearly men," our year being called Ah-affoe. They wore their beards, and when they died they were succeeded by their sons. Most of their implements and things of value were interred along with them. Pipes and tobacco were also put into the grave with the corpse, which was always perfumed and ornamented, and animals were offered in sacrifice to them. None accompanied their funerals but those of the same profession or tribe. These buried them after sunset, and always returned from the grave by a different way from that which they went.

These magicians were also our doctors or physicians. They practised bleeding by cupping, and were very successful in healing wounds and expelling poisons. They had likewise some extraordinary method of discovering jealousy, theft, and poisoning; the success of which no doubt they derived from their unbounded influence over the credulity and superstition of the people. I do not remember what those methods were, except that as to poisoning; I recollect an instance or two, which I hope it will not be deemed impertinent here to insert, as it may serve as a kind of specimen of the rest, and is still used by the negroes in the West Indies. A virgin had been poisoned, but it was not known by whom. The doctors ordered the corpse to be taken up by some persons and carried to the grave. As soon as the bearers had raised it on their shoulders, they seemed seized with some sudden impulse, and ran to and fro unable to stop themselves. At last, after having passed through a number of thorns and prickly bushes unhurt, the corpse fell from them close to a house, and defaced it in the fall; and, the owner being taken up, he immediately confessed the poisoning.¹

The natives are extremely cautious about poison. When they buy any eatable the seller kisses it all round before the buyer, to show him it is not poisoned; and the same is done when any meat or drink is presented, particularly to a stranger. We have serpents of different kinds, some of which are esteemed ominous when they appear in our houses, and these we never molest. I remember two of those ominous snakes, each of which was as thick as the calf of a man's leg, and in colour resembling a dolphin in the water, crept at different times into my mother's night-house, where I always lay with her, and coiled themselves into folds, and each time they crowed like a cock. I was desired by some of our wise men to touch these, that I might be interested in the good omens, which I did, for they were quite harmless and would tamely suffer themselves to be handled; and then they were put into a large open earthen pan and set on one side of the highway. Some of our snakes, however, were poisonous: one of them crossed the road one day when I was standing on it, and passed between my feet without offering to touch me, to the great surprise of many who saw it; and these incidents were accounted by the wise men, and therefore by my mother and the rest of the people, as remarkable omens in my favour.

Such is the imperfect sketch my memory has furnished me with of the manners and customs of a people among whom I first drew my breath. And here I cannot forbear suggesting what has long struck me very forcibly, namely, the strong analogy which even by this sketch, imperfect as it is, appears to prevail in the manners and customs of my countrymen and those of the Jews before they reached the Land of Promise, and particularly the patriarchs while they were yet in that pastoral state which is described in Genesis—an analogy which alone would induce me to think that the one people had sprung from the other. Indeed this is the opinion of Dr. Gill,² who, in his commentary on Genesis, very ably deduces the pedigree of the Africans from Afer and Afra, the descendants of Abraham by Keturah, his wife and concubine (for both these titles are applied to her). It is also conformable to the sentiments of Dr. John Clarke, formerly Dean of Sarum, in his Truth of the Christian Religion:³ both these authors concur in ascribing to us this original. The reasonings of these gentlemen are still further confirmed by the scripture chronology; and if any further corroboration were required, this resemblance in so many respects is a strong evidence in support of the opinion. Like the Israelites in their primitive state, our government was conducted by our chiefs or judges, our wise men and elders; and the head of a family with us enjoyed a similar authority over his household with that which is ascribed to Abraham and the other patriarchs. The law of retaliation obtained almost universally with us as with them; and even their religion appeared to have shed upon us a ray of its glory, though broken and spent in its passage, or eclipsed by the cloud with which time, tradition, and ignorance might have enveloped it; for we had our circumcision (a rule I believe peculiar to that people); we had also our sacrifices and burnt-offerings, our washings and purifications, on the same occasions as they had.

As to the difference of colour between the Eboan Africans and the modern Jews, I shall not presume to account for it. It is a subject which has engaged the pens of men of both genius and learning, and is far above my ¹ [Equiano's note] An instance of this kind happened at Montserrat in the West Indies in the year 1763. I then belonged to the Charming Sally, Capt. Doran. The chief mate, Mr. Mansfield, and some of the crew, being one day on shore, were present at the burying of a poisoned negro girl. Though they had often heard of the circumstance of the running in such cases, and had even seen it, they imagined it to be a trick of the corpse-bearers. The mate therefore desired two of the sailors to take up the coffin and carry it to the grave. The sailors, who were all of the same opinion, readily obeyed; but they had scarcely raised it to their shoulders before they began to run furiously about, quite unable to direct themselves, till at last, without intention, they came to the hut of him who had poisoned the girl. The coffin then immediately fell from their shoulders against the hut, and damaged part of the wall. The owner of the hut was taken into custody on this, and confessed the poisoning. I give this story as it was related by the mate and crew on their return to the ship. The credit which is due to it I leave with the reader.

Dr. Gill John Gill (1697–1771), the Baptist author of An Exposition of the Old Testament, in which Are Recorded the Original of Mankind, of the Several Nations of the World, and of the Jewish Nation in Particular... (1788).

² Dr. John ... Religion John Clarke (1682–1757) published a translation of a seventeenth-century religious work by Hugo Grotius, The Truth of the Christian Religion (1627), in 1786.

strength. The most able and Reverend Mr. T. Clarkson, however, in his much admired Essay on the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species, has ascertained the cause in a manner that at once solves every objection on that account and, on my mind at least, has produced the fullest conviction. I shall therefore refer to that performance for the theory, contenting myself with extracting a fact as related by Dr. Mitchel.¹ “The Spaniards, who have inhabited America, under the torrid zone, for any time, are become as dark coloured as our native Indians of Virginia; of which I myself have been a witness.” There is also another instance of a Portuguese settlement at Mitomba, a river in Sierra Leona, where the inhabitants are bred from a mixture of the first Portuguese discoverers with the natives, and are now become, in their complexion, and in the woolly quality of their hair, perfect negroes, retaining however a smattering of the Portuguese language.

These instances, and a great many more which might be adduced, while they show how the complexions of the same persons vary in different climates, it is hoped may tend also to remove the prejudice that some conceive against the natives of Africa on account of their colour. Surely the minds of the Spaniards did not change with their complexions! Are there not causes enough to which the apparent inferiority of an African may be ascribed, without limiting the goodness of God, and supposing he forbore to stamp understanding on certainly his own image, because “carved in ebony”?² Might it not naturally be ascribed to their situation?

When they come among Europeans, they are ignorant of their language, religion, manners, and customs. Are any pains taken to teach them these? Are they treated as men? Does not slavery itself depress the mind, and extinguish all its fire and every noble sentiment? But, above all, what advantages do not a refined people possess over those who are rude and uncultivated. Let the polished and haughty European recollect that his ancestors were once, like the Africans, uncivilized, and even barbarous. Did Nature make them inferior to their sons? And should they too have been made slaves? Every rational mind answers, No. Let such reflections as these melt the pride of their superiority into sympathy for the wants and miseries of their sable brethren, and compel them to acknowledge that understanding is not confined to feature or colour. If, when they look round the world, they feel exultation, let it be tempered with benevolence to others, and gratitude to God, “who hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth;”³ and whose wisdom is not our wisdom, neither are our ways his ways.”

CHAPTER 2

The author's birth and parentage—His being kidnapped with his sister—Their separation—Surprise at meeting again—Are finally separated—Account of the different places and incidents the author met with till his arrival on the coast—The effect the sight of a slave ship had on him—He sails for the West Indies—Horrors of a slave ship—Arrives at Barbadoes, where the cargo is sold and dispersed.

I hope the reader will not think I have trespassed on his patience in introducing myself to him with some account of the manners and customs of my country.⁴ They had been implanted in me with great care, and made an impression on my mind which time could not erase, and which all the adversity and variety of fortune I have since experienced served only to rivet and record; for, whether the love of one's country be real or imaginary, or a lesson of reason, or an instinct of nature, I still look back with pleasure on the first scenes of my life, though that pleasure has been for the most part mingled with sorrow.

I have already acquainted the reader with the time and place of my birth. My father, besides many slaves, had a numerous family, of which seven lived to grow up, including myself and a sister, who was the only daughter. As I was the youngest of the sons, I became, of course, the greatest favourite with my mother, and was always with her; and she used to take particular pains to form my mind. I was trained up from my

¹ [Equiano's note] Philos. Trans. No. 476, Sect. 4, cited by Mr. Clarkson, p. 205.

² carved in ebony Cf. The Holy and Profane State, 2.20 (1642): “But our captain counts the Image of God nevertheless his image, cut in ebony as if done in ivory.”

³ [Equiano's note] Acts, c. 17 v. 26.

⁴ my country Equiano says he was born in Essaka, a country located in the interior of present-day Nigeria.

earliest years in the art of war; my daily exercise was shooting and throwing javelins, and my mother adorned me with emblems after the manner of our greatest warriors. In this way I grew up till I was turned the age of eleven, when an end was put to my happiness in the following manner. Generally, when the grown people in the neighbourhood were gone far in the fields to labour, the children assembled together in some of the neighbours' premises to play; and commonly some of us used to get up a tree to look out for any assailant or kidnapper that might come upon us; for they sometimes took those opportunities of our parents' absence to attack and carry off as many as they could seize. One day, as I was watching at the top of a tree in our yard, I saw one of those people come into the yard of our next neighbour but one, to kidnap, there being many stout young people in it. Immediately on this I gave the alarm of the rogue, and he was surrounded by the stoutest of them, who entangled him with cords, so that he could not escape till some of the grown people came and secured him. But alas! ere long it was my fate to be thus attacked, and to be carried off, when none of the grown people were nigh. One day, when all our people were gone out to their works as usual, and only I and my dear sister were left to mind the house, two men and a woman got over our walls and in a moment seized us both, and, without giving us time to cry out or make resistance, they stopped our mouths and ran off with us into the nearest wood. Here they tied our hands and continued to carry us as far as they could, till night came on, when we reached a small house where the robbers halted for refreshment and spent the night. We were then unbound, but were unable to take any food; and, being quite overpowered by fatigue and grief, our only relief was some sleep, which allayed our misfortune for a short time.

The next morning we left the house and continued travelling all the day. For a long time we had kept the woods, but at last we came into a road, which I believed I knew. I had now some hopes of being delivered, for we had advanced but a little way before I discovered some people at a distance, on which I began to cry out for their assistance. But my cries had no other effect than to make them tie me faster and stop my mouth, and then they put me into a large sack. They also stopped my sister's mouth and tied her hands, and in this manner we proceeded till we were out of the sight of these people. When we went to rest the following night they offered us some victuals, but we refused it, and the only comfort we had was in being in one another's arms all that night, and bathing each other with our tears. But alas! we were soon deprived of even the small comfort of weeping together. The next day proved a day of greater sorrow than I had yet experienced, for my sister and I were then separated while we lay clasped in each other's arms. It was in vain that we besought them not to part us; she was torn from me and immediately carried away, while I was left in a state of distraction not to be described. I cried and grieved continually, and for several days I did not eat anything but what they forced into my mouth.

At length, after many days travelling, during which I had often changed masters, I got into the hands of a chieftain in a very pleasant country. This man had two wives and some children, and they all used me extremely well, and did all they could to comfort me—particularly the first wife, who was something like my mother. Although I was a great many days' journey from my father's house, yet these people spoke exactly the same language with us. This first master of mine, as I may call him, was a smith,¹ and my principal employment was working his bellows, which were the same kind as I had seen in my vicinity. They were in some respects not unlike the stoves here in gentlemen's kitchens, and were covered over with leather; and in the middle of that leather a stick was fixed, and a person stood up and worked it in the same manner as is done to pump water out of a cask with a hand pump. I believe it was gold he worked, for it was of a lovely bright yellow colour, and was worn by the women on their wrists and ankles.

I was there I suppose about a month, and they at last used to trust me some little distance from the house. This liberty I used in embracing every opportunity to inquire the way to my own home; and I also sometimes, for the same purpose, went with the maidens in the cool of the evenings to bring pitchers of water from the springs for the use of the house. I had also remarked where the sun rose in the morning and set in the evening as I had travelled along, and I had observed that my father's house was towards the rising of the sun. I therefore determined to seize the first opportunity of making my escape, and to shape my course for that quarter; for I was quite oppressed and weighed down by grief after my mother and friends; and my love of liberty, ever great, was strengthened by the mortifying circumstance of not daring to eat with the free-born children, although I was mostly their companion.

¹ smith One who works with metals.

While I was projecting my escape, one day an unlucky event happened which quite disconcerted my plan and put an end to my hopes. I used to be sometimes employed in assisting an elderly woman slave to cook and take care of the poultry, and one morning while I was feeding some chickens, I happened to toss a small pebble at one of them, which hit it on the middle and directly killed it. The old slave, having soon after missed the chicken, inquired after it; and on my relating the accident (for I told her the truth, because my mother would never suffer me to tell a lie), she flew into a violent passion, threatened that I should suffer for it, and, my master being out, she immediately went and told her mistress what I had done. This alarmed me very much, and I expected an instant flogging, which to me was uncommonly dreadful, for I had seldom been beaten at home. I therefore resolved to fly, and accordingly I ran into a thicket that was hard by and hid myself in the bushes. Soon afterwards my mistress and the slave returned, and, not seeing me, they searched all the house; but, not finding me, and I not making answer when they called to me, they thought I had run away, and the whole neighbourhood was raised in the pursuit of me. In that part of the country (as in ours) the houses and villages were skirted with woods, or shrubberies, and the bushes were so thick that a man could readily conceal himself in them so as to elude the strictest search. The neighbours continued the whole day looking for me, and several times many of them came within a few yards of the place where I lay hid. I then gave myself up for lost entirely and expected every moment, when I heard a rustling among the trees, to be found out and punished by my master. But they never discovered me, though they were often so near that I even heard their conjectures as they were looking about for me; and I now learned from them that any attempt to return home would be hopeless. Most of them supposed I had fled towards home, but the distance was so great, and the way so intricate, that they thought I could never reach it, and that I should be lost in the woods. When I heard this I was seized with a violent panic and abandoned myself to despair. Night too began to approach, and aggravated all my fears. I had before entertained hopes of getting home, and I had determined when it should be dark to make the attempt; but I was now convinced it was fruitless, and I began to consider that, if possibly I could escape all other animals, I could not those of the human kind, and that, not knowing the way, I must perish in the woods. Thus was I like the hunted deer:

Ev'ry leaf and ev'ry whisp'ring breath
Conveyed a foe, and ev'ry foe a death.¹

I heard frequent rustlings among the leaves, and, being pretty sure they were snakes, I expected every instant to be stung by them. This increased my anguish, and the horror of my situation became now quite insupportable. I at length quitted the thicket, very faint and hungry, for I had not eaten or drank anything all the day, and crept to my master's kitchen, from whence I set out at first, and which was an open shed, and laid myself down in the ashes with an anxious wish for death to relieve me from all my pains. I was scarcely awake in the morning when the old woman slave, who was the first up, came to light the fire and saw me in the fire-place. She was very much surprised to see me, and could scarcely believe her own eyes. She now promised to intercede for me, and went for her master, who soon after came and, having slightly reprimanded me, ordered me to be taken care of and not to be ill-treated.

Soon after this my master's only daughter, and child by his first wife, sickened and died, which affected him so much that for some time he was almost frantic, and really would have killed himself, had he not been watched and prevented. However, in a small time afterwards he recovered, and I was again sold. I was now carried to the left of the sun's rising, through many different countries and a number of large woods. The people I was sold to used to carry me very often, when I was tired, either on their shoulders or on their backs. I saw many convenient, well built sheds along the roads, at proper distances to accommodate the merchants and travellers, who lay in those buildings along with their wives, who often accompany them; and they always go well armed.

¹ Ev'ry ... death Cf. lines 287–88 of John Denham's "Cooper's Hill": "Now every leaf, and every moving breath / Presents a foe, and every foe a death."

From the time I left my own nation, I always found somebody that understood me, till I came to the sea coast. The languages of different nations did not totally differ, nor were they so copious as those of the Europeans, particularly the English. They were therefore easily learned, and while I was journeying thus through Africa I acquired two or three different tongues. In this manner I had been travelling for a considerable time when one evening, to my great surprise, whom should I see brought to the house where I was but my dear sister! As soon as she saw me she gave a loud shriek and ran into my arms. I was quite overpowered: neither of us could speak, but for a considerable time clung to each other in mutual embraces, unable to do any thing but weep. Our meeting affected all who saw us; and indeed I must acknowledge, in honour of those sable destroyers of human rights, that I never met with any ill treatment, or saw any offered to their slaves, except tying them when necessary, to keep them from running away. When these people knew we were brother and sister they indulged us together, and the man to whom I supposed we belonged lay with us, he in the middle, while she and I held one another by the hands across his breast all night; and thus for a while we forgot our misfortunes in the joy of being together. But even this small comfort was soon to have an end, for scarcely had the fatal morning appeared when she was again torn from me forever! I was now more miserable, if possible, than before. The small relief which her presence gave me from pain was gone, and the wretchedness of my situation was redoubled by my anxiety after her fate and my apprehensions lest her sufferings should be greater than mine, when I could not be with her to alleviate them. Yes, thou dear partner of all my childish sports! thou sharer of my joys and sorrows! happy should I have ever esteemed myself to encounter every misery for you, and to procure your freedom by the sacrifice of my own. Though you were early forced from my arms, your image has been always riveted in my heart, from which neither time nor fortune have been able to remove it; so that, while the thoughts of your sufferings have damped my prosperity, they have mingled with adversity and increased its bitterness. To that Heaven which protects the weak from the strong, I commit the care of your innocence and virtues, if they have not already received their full reward, and if your youth and delicacy have not long since fallen victims to the violence of the African trader, the pestilential stench of a Guinea ship,¹ the seasoning in the European colonies, or the lash and lust of a brutal and unrelenting overseer.

I did not long remain after my sister. I was again sold and carried through a number of places, till, after travelling a considerable time, I came to a town called Tinmah, in the most beautiful country I had yet seen in Africa. It was extremely rich, and there were many rivulets which flowed through it and supplied a large pond in the centre of the town, where the people washed. Here I first saw and tasted cocoa-nuts, which I thought superior to any nuts I had ever tasted before; and the trees, which were loaded, were also interspersed amongst the houses, which had commodious shades adjoining and were in the same manner as ours, the insides being neatly plastered and whitewashed. Here I also saw and tasted for the first time sugar cane. Their money consisted of little white shells the size of the fingernail. I was sold here for one hundred and seventy-two of them by a merchant who lived, and brought me, there. I had been about two or three days at his house when a wealthy widow, a neighbour of his, came there one evening and brought with her an only son, a young gentleman about my own age and size. Here they saw me; and, having taken a fancy to me, I was bought of the merchant and went home with them. Her house and premises were situated close to one of those rivulets I have mentioned, and were the finest I ever saw in Africa: they were very extensive, and she had a number of slaves to attend her. The next day I was washed and perfumed, and when mealtime came I was led into the presence of my mistress, and ate and drank before her with her son. This filled me with astonishment, and I could scarce help expressing my surprise that the young gentleman should suffer me, who was bound, to eat with him, who was free; and not only so, but that he would not at any time either eat or drink till I had taken first, because I was the eldest (which was agreeable to our custom). Indeed, everything here, and all their treatment of me, made me forget that I was a slave. The language of these people resembled ours so nearly that we understood each other perfectly. They had also the very same customs as we. There were likewise slaves daily to attend us, while my young master and I with other boys sported with our darts and bows and arrows, as I had been used to do at home. In this resemblance to my former happy state I passed about two months; and I now began to think I was to be adopted into the family, and was beginning to be reconciled to my situation and to forget by degrees my misfortunes, when all at once the delusion vanished; for, without the least previous knowledge, one morning early, while my dear master and companion was still asleep, I was wakened out of my reverie to fresh sorrow, and hurried away even amongst the uncircumcised.¹

Thus at the very moment I dreamed of the greatest happiness I found myself most miserable, and it seemed as if fortune wished to give me this taste of joy only to render the reverse more poignant. The change I now experienced was as painful as it was sudden and unexpected. It was a change indeed from a state of bliss to a scene which is inexpressible by me, as it discovered to me an element I had never before beheld, and till then had no idea of, and wherein such instances of hardship and cruelty continually occurred, as I can never reflect on but with horror.

All the nations and people I had hitherto passed through resembled our own in their manners, customs, and language, but I came at length to a country, the inhabitants of which differed from us in all those particulars. I was very much struck with this difference, especially when I came among a people who did not circumcise, and ate without washing their hands. They cooked also in iron pots, and had European cutlasses and cross bows, which were unknown to us, and fought with their fists amongst themselves. Their women were not so modest as ours, for they ate and drank and slept with their men. But, above all, I was amazed to see no sacrifices or offerings among them. In some of those places the people ornamented themselves with scars, and likewise filed their teeth very sharp. They wanted sometimes to ornament me in the same manner, but I would not suffer them, hoping that I might sometime be among a people who did not thus disfigure themselves, as I thought they did. At last I came to the banks of a large river which was covered with canoes, in which the people appeared to live with their household utensils and provisions of all kinds. I was beyond measure astonished at this, as I had never before seen any water larger than a pond or a rivulet, and my surprise was mingled with no small fear when I was put into one of these canoes and we began to paddle and move along the river. We continued going on thus till night; and when we came to land and made fires on the banks, each family by themselves, some dragged their canoes on shore, others stayed and cooked in theirs and laid in them all night. Those on the land had mats, of which they made tents, some in the shape of little houses. In these we slept, and after the morning meal we embarked again and proceeded as before. I was often very much astonished to see some of the women, as well as the men, jump into the water, dive to the bottom, come up again, and swim about.

Thus I continued to travel, sometimes by land, sometimes by water, through different countries and various nations, till, at the end of six or seven months after I had been kidnapped, I arrived at the seacoast. It would be tedious and uninteresting to relate all the incidents which befell me during this journey, and which I have not yet forgotten; of the various hands I passed through, and the manners and customs of all the different people among whom I lived. I shall therefore only observe that in all the places where I was the soil was exceedingly rich; the pumpkins, eadas,² plantains, yams, etc., etc., were in great abundance, and of incredible size. There were also vast quantities of different gums, though not used for any purpose, and everywhere a great deal of tobacco. The cotton even grew quite wild, and there was plenty of redwood. I saw no mechanics³ whatever in all the way, except such as I have mentioned. The chief employment in all these countries was agriculture, and both the males and females, as with us, were brought up to it, and trained in the arts of war.

² eadas Clearly a fruit or vegetable, but what sort is uncertain.

mechanics Artisans.

uncircumcised I.e., heathens, foreigners.

The first object which saluted my eyes when I arrived on the coast was the sea, and a slave ship, which was then riding at anchor and waiting for its cargo. These filled me with astonishment, which was soon converted into terror when I was carried on board. I was immediately handled and tossed up, to see if I were sound, by some of the crew; and I was now persuaded that I had gotten into a world of bad spirits, and that they were going to kill me. Their complexions, too, differing so much from ours, their long hair, and the language they spoke (which was very different from any I had ever heard) united to confirm me in this belief. Indeed, such were the horrors of my views and fears at the moment that, if ten thousand worlds had been my own, I would have freely parted with them all to have exchanged my condition with that of the meanest slave in my own country. When I looked round the ship, too, and saw a large furnace or copper boiling, and a multitude of black people of every description chained together, every one of their countenances expressing dejection and sorrow, I no longer doubted of my fate; and, quite overpowered with horror and anguish, I fell motionless on the deck and fainted. When I recovered a little I found some black people about me who I believed were some of those who brought me on board and had been receiving their pay; they talked to me in order to cheer me, but all in vain. I asked them if we were not to be eaten by those white men with horrible looks, red faces, and loose hair. They told me I was not, and one of the crew brought me a small portion of spirituous liquor in a wine glass; but, being afraid of him, I would not take it out of his hand. One of the blacks therefore took it from him and gave it to me, and I took a little down my palate, which, instead of reviving me as they thought it would, threw me into the greatest consternation at the strange feeling it produced, having never tasted any such liquor before.

Soon after this the blacks who brought me on board went off, and left me abandoned to despair. I now saw myself deprived of all chance of returning to my native country, or even the least glimpse of hope of gaining the shore, which I now considered as friendly; and I even wished for my former slavery in preference to my present situation, which was filled with horrors of every kind, still heightened by my ignorance of what I was to undergo. I was not long suffered to indulge my grief; I was soon put down under the decks, and there I received such a salutation in my nostrils as I had never experienced in my life; so that, with the loathsomeness of the stench and crying together, I became so sick and low that I was not able to eat, nor had I the least desire to taste anything. I now wished for the last friend, death, to relieve me; but soon, to my grief, two of the white men offered me eatables; and, on my refusing to eat, one of them held me fast by the hands and laid me across, I think, the windlass,¹ and tied my feet while the other flogged me severely. I had never experienced anything of this kind before; and although, not being used to the water, I naturally feared that element the first time I saw it, yet nevertheless, could I have got over the nettings, I would have jumped over the side. But I could not, and besides, the crew used to watch us very closely who were not chained down to the decks, lest we should leap into the water, and I have seen some of these poor African prisoners most severely cut for attempting to do so, and hourly whipped for not eating. This indeed was often the case with myself.

In a little time after, amongst the poor chained men I found some of my own nation, which in a small degree gave ease to my mind. I inquired of these what was to be done with us; they gave me to understand we were to be carried to these white people's country to work for them. I then was a little revived and thought, if it were no worse than working, my situation was not so desperate. But still I feared I should be put to death; the white people looked and acted, as I thought, in so savage a manner—for I had never seen among any people such instances of brutal cruelty, and this not only shown towards us blacks, but also to some of the whites themselves. One white man in particular I saw, when we were permitted to be on deck, flogged so unmercifully with a large rope near the foremast that he died in consequence of it, and they tossed him over the side as they would have done a brute.² This made me fear these people the more, and I expected nothing less than to be treated in the same manner. I could not help expressing my fears and apprehensions to some of my countrymen. I asked them if these people had no country, but lived in this hollow place (the ship). They told me they did not, but came from a distant one. "Then," said I, "how comes it in all our country we never heard of them?" They told me because they lived so very far off. I then asked, where were their women? had they any like themselves? I was told they had. "And why," said I, "do we not see them?" They answered, because they were left behind. I asked how the vessel could go. They told me they could not tell, but that there were cloths put upon the masts by the help of the ropes I saw, and then the vessel went on; and the white men had some spell or magic they put in the water when they liked in order to stop the vessel. I was exceedingly amazed at this account, and really thought they were spirits. I therefore wished much to be from amongst them, for I expected they would sacrifice me. But my wishes were vain, for we were so quartered that it was impossible for any of us to make our escape.

¹ windlass On board ship, a mechanical contrivance used for winding ropes or chains.

² brute Animal.

While we stayed on the coast I was mostly on deck, and one day, to my great astonishment, I saw one of these vessels coming in with the sails up. As soon as the whites saw it, they gave a great shout, at which we were amazed; and the more so as the vessel appeared larger by approaching nearer. At last she came to an anchor in my sight, and when the anchor was let go I and my countrymen who saw it were lost in astonishment to observe the vessel stop, and were now convinced it was done by magic. Soon after this the other ship got her boats out, and they came on board of us, and the people of both ships seemed very glad to see each other. Several of the strangers also shook hands with us black people and made motions with their hands, signifying, I suppose, we were to go to their country; but we did not understand them. At last, when the ship we were in had got in all her cargo, they made ready with many fearful noises, and we were all put under deck, so that we could not see how they managed the vessel. But this disappointment was the least of my sorrow. The stench of the hold while we were on the coast was so intolerably loathsome that it was dangerous to remain there for any time, and some of us had been permitted to stay on the deck for the fresh air, but now that the whole ship's cargo were confined together, it became absolutely pestilential. The closeness of the place and the heat of the climate, added to the number in the ship, which was so crowded that each had scarcely room to turn himself, almost suffocated us. This produced copious perspirations, so that the air soon became unfit for respiration from a variety of loathsome smells, and brought on a sickness among the slaves, of which many died, thus falling victims to the improvident avarice, as I may call it, of their purchasers. This wretched situation was again aggravated by the galling¹ of the chains, now become insupportable, and the filth of the necessary tubs, into which the children often fell, and were almost suffocated. The shrieks of the women and the groans of the dying rendered the whole a scene of horror almost inconceivable. Happily perhaps for myself, I was soon reduced so low here that it was thought necessary to keep me almost always on deck; and from my extreme youth I was not put in fetters. In this situation I expected every hour to share the fate of my companions, some of whom were almost daily brought upon deck at the point of death, which I began to hope would soon put an end to my miseries. Often did I think many of the inhabitants of the deep much more happy than myself. I envied them the freedom they enjoyed, and as often wished I could change my condition for theirs. Every circumstance I met with served only to render my state more painful and heighten my apprehensions and my opinion of the cruelty of the whites. One day they had taken a number of fishes; and when they had killed and satisfied themselves with as many as they thought fit, to our astonishment who were on the deck, rather than give any of them to us to eat as we expected, they tossed the remaining fish into the sea again, although we begged and prayed for some as well as we could, but in vain; and some of my countrymen, being pressed by hunger, took an opportunity, when they thought no one saw them, of trying to get a little privately; but they were discovered, and the attempt procured them some very severe floggings.

One day, when we had a smooth sea and moderate wind, two of my wearied countrymen who were chained together (I was near them at the time), preferring death to such a life of misery, somehow made through the nettings and jumped into the sea. Immediately another quite dejected fellow, who, on account of his illness, was suffered to be out of irons, also followed their example; and I believe many more would very soon have done the same if they had not been prevented by the ship's crew, who were instantly alarmed. Those of us that were the most active were in a moment put down under the deck, and there was such a noise and confusion amongst the people of the ship as I never heard before, to stop her and get the boat out to go after the slaves. However, two of the wretches were drowned; but they got the other, and afterwards flogged him unmercifully for thus attempting to prefer death to slavery.

¹ galling Chafing.

In this manner we continued to undergo more hardships than I can now relate, hardships which are inseparable from this accursed trade. Many a time we were near suffocation from the want of fresh air, which we were often without for whole days together. This, and the stench of the necessary tubs, carried off many. During our passage I first saw flying fishes, which surprised me very much: they used frequently to fly across the ship, and many of them fell on the deck. I also now first saw the use of the quadrant;¹ I had often with astonishment seen the mariners make observations with it, and I could not think what it meant. They at last took notice of my surprise, and one of them, willing to increase it, as well as to gratify my curiosity, made me one day look through it. The clouds appeared to me to be land, which disappeared as they passed along. This heightened my wonder, and I was now more persuaded than ever that I was in another world, and that everything about me was magic.

At last we came in sight of the island of Barbados, at which the whites on board gave a great shout and made many signs of joy to us. We did not know what to think of this, but as the vessel drew nearer we plainly saw the harbour and other ships of different kinds and sizes, and we soon anchored amongst them off Bridgetown. Many merchants and planters now came on board, though it was in the evening. They put us in separate parcels and examined us attentively. They also made us jump, and pointed to the land, signifying we were to go there. We thought by this we should be eaten by these ugly men, as they appeared to us; and, when soon after we were all put down under the deck again, there was much dread and trembling among us, and nothing but bitter cries to be heard all the night from these apprehensions, inso-much that at last the white people got some old slaves from the land to pacify us. They told us we were not to be eaten, but to work, and were soon to go on land, where we should see many of our country people. This report eased us much; and sure enough, soon after we were landed, there came to us Africans of all languages. We were conducted immediately to the merchant's yard, where we were all pent up together like so many sheep in a fold, without regard to sex or age. As every object was new to me, everything I saw filled me with surprise. What struck me first was that the houses were built with stories, and in every other respect different from those in Africa. But I was still more astonished on seeing people on horseback. I did not know what this could mean, and indeed I thought these people were full of nothing but magical arts. While I was in this astonishment, one of my fellow prisoners spoke to a countryman of his about the horses, who said they were the same kind they had in their country. I understood them, though they were from a distant part of Africa, and I thought it odd I had not seen any horses there; but afterwards, when I came to converse with different Africans, I found they had many horses amongst them, and much larger than those I then saw.

We were not many days in the merchant's custody before we were sold after their usual manner, which is this: on a signal given (as the beat of a drum), the buyers rush at once into the yard where the slaves are confined, and make choice of that parcel they like best. The noise and clamour with which this is attended, and the eagerness visible in the countenances of the buyers, serve not a little to increase the apprehensions of the terrified Africans, who may well be supposed to consider them as the ministers of that destruction to which they think themselves devoted. In this manner, without scruple, are relations and friends separated, most of them never to see each other again. I remember in the vessel in which I was brought over, in the men's apartment there were several brothers who, in the sale, were sold in different lots; and it was very moving on this occasion to see and hear their cries at parting. O ye nominal Christians!² Might not an African ask you, "Learned you this from quadrant Instrument used for taking altitudes.

nominal Christians I.e., Christians in name only.

your God, who says unto you, 'Do unto all men as you would men should do unto you'? Is it not enough that we are torn from our country and friends to toil for your luxury and lust of gain? Must every tender feeling be likewise sacrificed to your avarice? Are the dearest friends and relations, now rendered more dear by their separation from their kindred, still to be parted from each other, and thus prevented from cheering the gloom of slavery with the small comfort of being together and mingling their sufferings and sorrows? Why are parents to lose their children, brothers their sisters, or husbands their wives?" Surely this is a new refinement in cruelty, which, while it has no advantage to atone for it, thus aggravates distress and adds fresh horrors even to the wretchedness of slavery.

—1789

IN CONTEXT

Reactions to Olaudah Equiano's Work

Reactions to the publication of Equiano's Interesting Narrative varied widely. At one extreme The Oracle and The Star attempted to discredit the work by asserting that Equiano had been born and bred in Santa Cruz in the West Indies rather than in Africa. (The writer of the piece in The Oracle went on to cast slurs against abolitionist William Wilberforce as well, falsely asserting that Wilberforce himself had an interest in a slave-owning plantation.) Excerpts from some of the reactions to Equiano's work in other journals are reproduced below; the comments in The Analytic Review may be of particular interest in that they were written by Mary Wollstonecraft.

from The Analytic Review, May 1789

The life of an African, written by himself, is certainly a curiosity, as it has been a favourite philosophic¹ whim to degrade the numerous nations, on whom the sun-beams more directly dart, below the common level of humanity, and hastily to conclude that nature, by making them inferior to the rest of the human race, designed to stamp them with a mark of slavery. How they were shaded down, from the fresh colour of northern rustics, to the sable hue seen on the African sands, is not our task to inquire, nor do we intend to draw a parallel between the abilities of a negro and European mechanic;² we shall only observe, that if these volumes do not exhibit extraordinary intellectual powers, sufficient to wipe off the stigma, yet the activity and ingenuity, which conspicuously appear in the character of Gustavus, place him on a par with the general mass of men, who fill the subordinate stations in a more civilized society than that which he was thrown into at his birth.

from The Gentleman's Magazine, June 1789

Among other contrivances (and perhaps one of the most innocent) to interest the national humanity in favour of the Negro slaves, one of them here writes his own history, as formerly another of them published his correspondence. These memoirs, written in a very unequal style, place mechanic Manual laborer.

¹ philosophic Scientific.

the writer on a par with the general mass of men in the subordinate stations of civilized society, and prove that there is no general rule without an exception.

from The Monthly Review, June 1789

We entertain no doubt of the general authenticity of this very intelligent African's story; though it is not improbable that some English writer has assisted him in the compilement, or, at least, the correction of his book; for it is sufficiently well-written. The Narrative wears an honest face; and we have conceived a good opinion of the man, from the artless manner in which he has detailed the variety of adventures and vicissitudes which have fallen to his lot. His publication appears very seasonable, at a time when negro-slavery is the subject of public investigation; and it seems calculated to increase the odium that has been excited against the West-India planters, on account of the cruelties that some are said to have exercised on their slaves, many instances of which are here detailed.

from The General Magazine and Impartial Review, July 1789

This is "a round unvarnished tale"¹ of the chequered adventures of an African, who early in life, was torn from his native country, by those savage dealers in a traffic disgraceful to humanity, and which has fixed a stain on the legislature of Britain. The Narrative appears to be written with much truth and simplicity. The author's account of the manners of the natives of his own province (Ebo) is interesting and pleasing; and the reader, unless perchance he is either a West-India planter, or Liverpool merchant, will find his humanity often severely wounded by the shameless barbarity practised towards the author's hapless countrymen in all our colonies; if he feel as he ought, the oppressed and the oppressors will equally excite his pity and indignation. That so unjust, so iniquitous a commerce may be abolished is our ardent wish; and we heartily join in our author's prayer, "That the God of Heaven may inspire the hearts of our Representatives in Parliament, with peculiar benevolence on that important day when so interesting a question is to be discussed; when thousands, in consequence of their determination, are to look for happiness or misery!"

a round unvarnished tale Cf. William Shakespeare, Othello 1.3.89.

PHILLIS WHEATLEY

1753 – 1784

Phillis Wheatley was the first author of African descent to publish a book of poetry in English, Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (London, 1773). During her life she gained an international readership on both sides of the Atlantic. Born in Africa and kidnapped by slave traders when she was six or seven years old, Wheatley was purchased by an evangelical family in Boston who taught her to read. She immersed herself in biblical and classical traditions and soon taught herself to write, publishing her first poem in a Rhode Island newspaper when she was a young teenager. A deeply religious poet who drew on John Milton and Alexander Pope, Wheatley was praised in her time by Voltaire, Benjamin Franklin, and George Washington. She is best known for her writing about her experience of slavery and the slave trade, including the controversial poem “On Being Brought from Africa to America.” More recently, scholars have come to recognize and appreciate the breadth of Wheatley’s work, including elegies, lyrics, hymns, and narrative poems inspired by the Old Testament and Ovid’s Metamorphoses. Long recognized as the founding author of the African-American literary tradition, she is now also considered one of the most important poets of colonial North America.

Wheatley was probably born in 1753 near the west coast of sub-Saharan Africa, although the precise place and date of her birth are unknown. She was brought to Boston in 1761 on the slave ship Phillis; she was named after the ship by her new masters, John and Susanna Wheatley. She first became famous in 1770 after the transatlantic reprinting of her elegy for George Whitefield, a founder of Methodism who preached frequently in North America and believed in the spiritual equality of Africans. Wheatley soon advertised in Boston for subscriptions to a book of twenty-eight poems but was unable to gather enough support for publication; Great Britain, however, proved friendlier ground. While visiting London with her master’s son, Nathaniel, in the summer of 1773, Wheatley helped arrange for her book’s publication under the patronage of Selina Hastings, the Countess of Huntingdon, a Methodist leader to whom Whitefield had been personal chaplain. In London, Wheatley met with many prominent historical figures, including Benjamin Franklin, Granville Sharp (the famous abolitionist), the Earl of Dartmouth (for whom Dartmouth College had been named), and Sir Brook Watson, eventual Lord Mayor of London. She wrote effusively of how she had been welcomed: “I was received in England with such kindness, complaisance, and so many marks of esteem and real friendship as astonishes me on the reflection.” Wheatley soon returned to Boston, however, to care for her ailing mistress.

As a poet, Wheatley was particularly adept at the heroic couplet, the dominant poetic form of the eighteenth century. Her devotion to Protestant Christianity is revealed in elegies that exhort surviving relatives to seek comfort in the glory of salvation. As with Milton before her, Wheatley mingled biblical references with frequent allusions to Greek and Roman myth, often invoking the Muses to her aid. A few meditative poems explore the workings of the mind (“On Recollection,” “On Imagination”), while more explicitly political poems such as “To the Right Honourable William, Earl of Dartmouth” display her commitment to freedom and equality. Wheatley’s letters to prominent individuals and personal friends—including Obour Tanner, an enslaved black woman living in Newport, Rhode Island—address her religious faith, her transatlantic travels, the sale of her book of poems, and her strong anti-slavery beliefs.

Wheatley's poetry challenged Western culture's racist belief that people of African descent were inferior to whites—even that Africans were less than fully human. Her patrons and publishers rightly assumed that many readers would be incredulous that a slave and native of Africa could have written a volume of poetry. Poems on Various Subjects thus includes a preface by Wheatley's master verifying her authorship, and an attestation of her poetic abilities signed by eighteen prominent Bostonians, including Thomas Hutchinson, Governor of Massachusetts, and John Hancock, future signer of the Declaration of Independence. The book also contained a frontispiece depicting Wheatley at her writing desk in humble servant's attire. Her poetic achievement remained an important touchstone in debates about race and slavery well into the nineteenth century.

Immediately after Poems on Various Subjects was published, many readers expressed outrage that such an accomplished poet was still enslaved. Responding to this pressure, John Wheatley manumitted Phillis in 1773. Throughout the period of the American Revolution she continued to write poems—among them a panegyric to George Washington. The war disrupted the transatlantic network of Methodist patrons that had supported her early career, however, and she never garnered enough support to publish a second book. She married John Peters, a free black man, in 1778 and died in 1784.

Wheatley was later adopted as an icon of the anti-slavery movement when abolitionists in Boston published a new edition of her book in 1834.

*To Maecenas*¹

Maecenas, you, beneath the myrtle shade,
Read o'er what poets sung, and shepherds played.
What felt those poets but you feel the same?
Does not your soul possess the sacred flame?
Their noble strains^o your equal genius shares
In softer language, and diviner airs.

verses

While Homer² paints lo! circumfused^o
in air,
Celestial Gods in mortal forms appear;
Swift as they move hear each recess rebound,
Heav'n quakes, earth trembles, and the shores resound.
Great Sire of verse, before my mortal eyes,
The lightnings blaze across the vaulted skies,
And, as the thunder shakes the heav'nly plains,

dispersed

A deep-felt horror thrills through all my veins.
Where gentler strains demand thy graceful song,
The length'ning line moves languishing along.
When great Patroclus³ courts Achilles' aid,
The grateful tribute of my tears is paid;
Prone on the shore he feels the pangs of love,
And stern Pelides⁴ tend'rest passions move.

Great Maro's⁵ strain in heav'nly numbers flows,
The Nine⁶ inspire, and all the bosom glows.
O could I rival thine and Virgil's page,
Or claim the Muses with the Mantuan Sage;⁷
Soon the same beauties should my mind adorn,
And the same ardors in my soul should burn:
Then should my song in bolder notes arise,

Patroclus In the Iliad, the character who pleads with Achilles, the great Greek warrior, to return to battle.

¹ Pelides Another name in the Iliad for Achilles, the son of Peleus.

² Maro A common name for Virgil.

³ Nine The Muses, nine goddesses who preside over the arts.

Mantuan Sage I.e., Virgil, born in Mantua.

Maecenas Wealthy Roman patron (d. 8 BCE) and the dedicatee of poems by Horace (56–8 BCE) and Virgil (70–19 BCE).

² Homer Ancient Greek poet, traditionally believed to be the author of the Iliad and Odyssey. Wheatley read Homer in a popular English translation by Alexander Pope (1688–1744).

And all my numbers pleasingly surprize;
But here I sit, and mourn a grov'ling mind,
That fain would mount, and ride upon the wind.

Not you, my friend, these plaintive strains become,
Not you, whose bosom is the Muses home;
When they from tow'ring Helicon¹ retire,
They fan in you the bright immortal fire,
But I less happy, cannot raise the song,
The fault'ring music dies upon my tongue.

The happier Terence² all the choir inspir'd,
His soul replenished, and his bosom fir'd;
But say, ye Muses, why this partial grace,
To one alone of Afric's sable race;
From age to age transmitting thus his name
With the first glory in the rolls of fame?

Thy virtues, great Maecenas! shall be sung
In praise of Him, from those virtues sprung:
While blooming wreaths around thy temples spread,
I'll snatch a laurel from thine honoured head,
While you indulgent smile upon the deed.

As long as Thames³ in streams majestic flows,
Or Naiads⁴ in their oozy beds repose,
While Phoebus⁵ reigns above the starry train,
While bright Aurora⁶ purples o'er the main,
So long, great Sir, the muse thy praise shall sing,
So long thy praise shall make Parnassus⁷ ring;
Then grant, Maecenas, thy paternal rays,
Hear me propitious,^o and defend my lays. with favor
—1773

¹ Helicon Mountain sacred to the Muses.

² [Wheatley's note] He was an African by birth. [Terence was a dramatist (d. c. 159 BCE) born in Carthage, in North Africa, who lived for a time as a slave in Rome.]

Thames The great river that flows through London.

⁴ Naiads Nymphs dwelling in springs and rivers.

⁵ Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun.

⁶ Aurora Goddess of the dawn.

Parnassus Sacred mountain in Greece associated with Apollo and the Muses.

To the University of Cambridge,⁸ in New-England

While an intrinsic ardor prompts to write,
The muses promise to assist my pen;
'Twas not long since I left my native shore
The land of errors, and Egyptian⁹ gloom:
Father of mercy, 'twas thy gracious hand
Brought me in safety from those dark abodes.

Students, to you 'tis giv'n to scan the heights
Above, to traverse the ethereal space,
And mark the systems of revolving worlds.
Still more, ye sons of science ye receive
The blissful news by messengers from heav'n,
How Jesus' blood for your redemption flows.
See him with hands out-stretcht upon the cross;
Immense compassion in his bosom glows;
He hears revilers, nor resents their scorn:
What matchless mercy in the Son of God!
When the whole human race by sin had fall'n,
He deigned to die that they might rise again,
And share with him in the sublimest skies,
Life without death, and glory without end.

Improve your privileges while they stay,
Ye pupils, and each hour redeem, that bears
Or good or bad report of you to heav'n.
Let sin, that baneful evil to the soul,
By you be shunned, nor once remit your guard;
Suppress the deadly serpent in its egg.
Ye blooming plants of human race divine,
An Ethiop¹⁰ tells you 'tis your greatest foe;
Its transient sweetness turns to endless pain,
And in immense perdition sinks the soul.
—1773 (WRITTEN 1767)

⁸ University of Cambridge Harvard University, in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

⁹ Egyptian Egypt was often substituted as a name for the entire continent of Africa.

¹⁰ Ethiop Ethiopian; i.e., African. Like Egypt, Ethiopia was often substituted as a name for Africa.

*To the King's Most Excellent Majesty*¹

Your subjects hope, dread Sire—

The crown upon your brows may flourish long,
And that your arm may in your God be strong!
O may your sceptre num'rous nations sway,
5 And all with love and readiness obey!

But how shall we the British king reward!
Rule thou in peace, our father, and our lord!
Midst the remembrance of thy favours past,
The meanest peasants most admire the last.²
10 May George, belov'd by all the nations round,
Live with heav'n's choicest constant blessings crown'd!

Great God, direct, and guard him from on high,
And from his head let ev'ry evil fly!
And may each clime with equal gladness see 15 A monarch's smile can set his subjects free!
—1773 (WRITTEN 1768)

On Being Brought from Africa to America

'Twas mercy brought me from my Pagan land,
Taught my benighted soul to understand
That there's a God, that there's a Saviour too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.
5 Some view our sable race with scornful eye,
"Their colour is a diabolic die."
Remember, Christians, Negros, black as Cain,³
May be refined and join th' angelic train.
—1773

To the King's ... Majesty As Wheatley's note to line 9 indicates, this poem celebrates the repeal by King George III (1738–1820) of the Stamp Act, a controversial measure that taxed printed material (such as newspapers and legal documents) throughout the American colonies. It was repealed in 1766.

² [Wheatley's note] The Repeal of the Stamp Act.

³ Cain The oldest son of Adam and Eve, who killed his younger brother, Abel, in Genesis 4. As punishment, God exiled Cain from Eden and set a mark of sin upon him. Some in Wheatley's time believed this mark took the form of dark skin, and attempted to justify slavery on the grounds that Africans were descended from Cain.

On the Death of a Young Lady of Five Years of Age

From dark abodes to fair ethereal^o light heavenly
Th' enraptured innocent has winged her flight;
On the kind bosom of eternal love
She finds unknown beatitude above.
5 This know, ye parents, nor her loss deplore,
She feels the iron hand of pain no more;
The dispensations of unerring grace,
Should turn your sorrows into grateful praise;
Let then no tears for her henceforward flow,
10 No more distressed in our dark vale below.

Her morning sun, which rose divinely bright,
Was quickly mantled with the gloom of night;
But hear in heav'n's blest bow'rs your Nancy fair,
And learn to imitate her language there.
15 "Thou, Lord, whom I behold with glory crowned,
By what sweet name, and in what tuneful sound
Wilt thou be praised? Seraphic^o pow'rs are faint angelic
Infinite love and majesty to paint.
To thee let all their grateful voices raise,
20 And saints and angels join their songs of praise."

Perfect in bliss she from her heav'nly home
Looks down, and smiling beckons you to come;
Why then, fond parents, why these fruitless groans?
Restrain your tears, and cease your plaintive moans.
25 Freed from a world of sin, and snares, and pain,
Why would you wish your daughter back again?
No—bow resigned. Let home your grief control,
And check the rising tumult of the soul.
Calm in the prosperous, and adverse day,
30 Adore the God who gives and takes away;
Eye him in all, his holy name revere,
Upright your actions, and your hearts sincere,
Till having sailed through life's tempestuous sea,
And from its rocks, and boist'rous billows free,
35 Yourself, safe landed on the blissful shore,
Shall join your happy babe to part no more.
—1773

On the Death of a Young Gentleman

Who taught thee conflict with the pow'rs of night,
 To vanquish Satan in the fields of fight?
 Who strung thy feeble arms with might unknown,
 How great thy conquest, and how bright thy crown!
 War with each principedom, throne, and pow'r is o'er,
 The scene is ended to return no more.
 O could my muse thy seat on high behold,
 How decked with laurel, how enriched with gold!
 O could she hear what praise thine harp employs,
 How sweet thine anthems, how divine thy joys!
 What heav'nly grandeur should exalt her strain!^o song
 What holy raptures in her numbers reign!
 To soothe the troubles of the mind to peace,
 To still the tumult of life's tossing seas,
 To ease the anguish of the parent's heart,
 What shall my sympathizing verse impart?
 Where is the balm to heal so deep a wound?
 Where shall a sov'reign remedy be found?
 Look, gracious Spirit, from thine heav'nly bow'r,
 And thy full joys into their bosoms pour;
 The raging tempest of their grief control,
 And spread the dawn of glory through the soul,
 To eye the path the saint departed trod,
 And trace him to the bosom of his God.
 —1773

An Hymn to the Morning

Attend my lays, ye ever honour'd nine,¹
 Assist my labours, and my strains^o refine; verses
 In smoothest numbers pour the notes along,
 For bright Aurora² now demands my song.
 Aurora hail, and all the thousands dies;^o colors
 Which deck thy progress through the vaulted skies:
 The morn awakes, and wide extends her rays,
 On ev'ry leaf the gentle zephyr plays;

¹ nine Muses, the goddesses who inspire the arts.

² Aurora Goddess of the dawn.

Harmonious lays the feather'd race³ resume,
 10 Dart the bright eye, and shake the painted plume.

Ye shady groves, your verdant gloom display
 To shield your poet from the burning day
 Calliope⁴ awake the sacred lyre,
 While thy fair sisters fan the pleasing fire:
 15 The bow'rs, the gales, the variegated skies
 In all their pleasures in my bosom rise.

See in the east th' illustrious king of day!
 His rising radiance drives the shades away—
 But Oh! I feel his fervid beams too strong, 20 And scarce begun, concludes th' abortive song.
 —1773

On Recollection

Mneme⁵ begin. Inspire, ye sacred nine,⁶
 Your vent'rous Afric in her great design.
 Mneme, immortal pow'r, I trace thy spring:
 Assist my strains, while I thy glories sing:
 5 The acts of long departed years, by thee
 Recover'd, in due order ranged we see:
 Thy pow'r the long-forgotten calls from night,
 That sweetly plays before the fancy's sight.

Mneme in our nocturnal visions pours
 10 The ample treasure of her secret stores;^o materials
 Swift from above she wings her silent flight
 Through Phoebe's⁷ realms, fair regent of the night;
 And, in her pomp of images displayed,
 To the high-raptured poet gives her aid,
 15 Through the unbounded regions of the mind,
 Diffusing light celestial and refined.
 The heav'nly phantom paints the actions done
 By ev'ry tribe beneath the rolling sun.

³ feather'd race Birds.

⁴ Calliope The Muse specifically devoted to epic poetry.

⁵ Mneme Mnemosyne, personification of memory and mother of the classical Muses, nine goddesses who preside over the arts.

⁶ nine I.e., the Muses.

⁷ Phoebe The moon.

Mneme, enthroned within the human breast,
 20 Has vice condemned, and ev'ry virtue blest.
 How sweet the sound when we her plaudit^o applause hear?
 Sweeter than music to the ravished ear,
 Sweeter than Maro's¹ entertaining strains^o verses
 Resounding through the groves, and hills, and plains.
 25 But how is Mneme dreaded by the race,²
 Who scorn her warnings, and despise her grace?
 By her unveiled each horrid crime appears,
 Her awful hand a cup of wormwood^o bears. bitterness
 Days, years mispent, O what a hell of woe!
 30 Hers the worst tortures that our souls can know.

Now eighteen years³ their destined course have run,
 In fast succession round the central sun.
 How did the follies of that period pass
 Unnoticed, but behold them writ in brass!
 35 In Recollection see them fresh return,
 And sure 'tis mine to be ashamed, and mourn.

O Virtue, smiling in immortal green,
 Do thou exert thy pow'r, and change the scene;
 Be thine employ to guide my future days,
 40 And mine to pay the tribute of my praise.

Of Recollection such the pow'r enthroned
 In ev'ry breast, and thus her pow'r is owned.
 The wretch, who dared the vengeance of the skies,⁴
 At last awakes in horror and surprize,
 15 By her alarmed, he sees impending fate,
 He howls in anguish, and repents too late.
 But O! what peace, what joys are hers t' impart
 To ev'ry holy, ev'ry upright heart!
 Thrice blest the man, who, in her sacred shrine,
 50 Feels himself sheltered from the wrath divine!
 —1773

On Imagination

Thy various works, imperial queen, we see,
 How bright their forms! how decked with pomp by thee!
 Thy wond'rous acts in beauteous order stand,
 And all attest how potent is thine hand.
 5 From Helicon's⁵ refulgent^o heights attend; radiant
 Ye sacred choir, and my attempts befriend:
 To tell her glories with a faithful tongue,
 Ye blooming graces, triumph in my song.
 Now here, now there, the roving Fancy flies,
 10 Till some loved object strikes her wand'ring eyes,
 Whose silken fetters all the senses bind,
 And soft captivity involves the mind.
 Imagination! who can sing thy force?
 Or who describe the swiftness of thy course?
 15 Soaring through air to find the bright abode,
 Th' empyreal^o palace of the thund'ring God, heavenly
 We on thy pinions^o can surpass the wind, wings
 And leave the rolling universe behind:
 From star to star the mental optics rove,
 20 Measure the skies, and range the realms above.
 There in one view we grasp the mighty whole,
 Or with new worlds amaze th' unbounded soul.
 Though Winter frowns to Fancy's raptured eyes
 The fields may flourish, and gay scenes arise;
 25 The frozen deeps^o may break their iron bands, seas
 And bid their waters murmur o'er the sands.
 Fair Flora⁶ may resume her fragrant reign,
 And with her flow'ry riches deck the plain;
 Sylvanus⁷ may diffuse his honours round,
 30 And all the forest may with leaves be crowned;
 Show'rs may descend, and dews their gems disclose,
 And nectar sparkle on the blooming rose.

¹ Maro During the Middle Ages, a common name for Virgil (70–19 BCE).

the race I.e., people of a certain nature.

³ eighteen years Wheatley's approximate age at the time she wrote the poem.

⁴ dared ... skies Dared to sin, prompting God's wrath.

Helicon Mountain sacred to the Muses.

⁶ Flora Roman goddess of spring.

Sylvanus Roman god of the forest.

Such is thy pow'r, nor are thine orders vain,
 O thou the leader of the mental train:
 In full perfection all thy works are wrought,
 And thine the sceptre o'er the realms of thought.
 Before thy throne the subject-passions bow,
 Of subject-passions sov'reign ruler thou;
 At thy command joy rushes on the heart,
 And through the glowing veins the spirits dart.

Fancy might now her silken pinions^o try wings
 To rise from earth, and sweep th' expanse on high;
 From Tithon's¹ bed now might Aurora rise,
 Her cheeks all glowing with celestial dies,^o colors
 While a pure stream of light o'erflows the skies.
 The monarch of the day I might behold,
 And all the mountains tipt with radiant gold,
 But I reluctant leave the pleasing views,
 Which Fancy dresses to delight the Muse;
 Winter austere forbids me to aspire,
 And northern tempests damp the rising fire;
 They chill the tides of Fancy's flowing sea,
 Cease then, my song, cease the unequal lay.
 —1773

To the Right Honourable William, Earl of Dartmouth, His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for North-America²

Hail, happy day, when, smiling like the morn,
 Fair Freedom rose, New-England to adorn:
 The northern clime beneath her genial ray,
 Dartmouth, congratulates thy blissful sway:

¹ Tithon Trojan prince, mortal lover of Aurora, goddess of the dawn.

² William... North-America William Legge (1731–1801), Second Earl of Dartmouth, in 1772 appointed Secretary of State for the Colonies by Lord North (1732–92). Dartmouth's support for the repeal of the Stamp Act in 1766 had earned him a favorable reputation among colonists angered by British taxation policies; expectations upon his appointment were therefore high. Wheatley initially wrote this poem at the instigation of Thomas Wooldridge, who suggested Dartmouth's appointment as a subject when he visited the Wheatleys in Boston in October 1772. Wheatley revised the poem for its inclusion in Poems on Various Subjects; the revised version is printed here.

Elate with hope her race no longer mourns,
 Each soul expands, each grateful bosom burns,
 While in thine hand with pleasure we behold
 The silken reins, and Freedom's charms unfold.
 Long lost to realms beneath the northern skies
 She shines supreme, while hated faction dies:
 Soon as appeared the Goddess^o long desired, Freedom
 Sick at the view, she^o languished and expired; faction
 Thus from the splendors of the morning light
 The owl in sadness seeks the caves of night.

No more, America, in mournful strain
 Of wrongs, and grievance unredressed complain,
 No longer shall thou dread the iron chain,
 Which wanton Tyranny with lawless hand
 Had made, and with it meant t' enslave the land.

Should you, my lord, while you peruse my song,
 Wonder from whence my love of freedom sprung,
 Whence flow these wishes for the common good,
 By feeling hearts alone best understood,
 I, young in life, by seeming cruel fate
 Was snatch'd from Afric's fancy'd happy seat:
 What pangs excruciating must molest,^o disturb
 What sorrows labour in my parent's breast?
 Steeled^o was that soul and by no misery moved hardened
 That from a father seized his babe below'd:
 Such, such my case.³ And can I then but pray
 Others may never feel tyrannic sway?

For favours past, great Sir, our thanks are due,
 And thee we ask thy favours to renew,
 Since in thy pow'r, as in thy will before,
 To soothe the griefs, which thou did'st once deplore.
 May heav'nly grace the sacred sanction^o give blessing
 To all thy works, and thou forever live
 Not only on the wings of fleeting fame,
 Though praise immortal crowns the patriot's name,
 But to conduct to heav'n's refulgent^o radiant fane,^o temple
 May fiery coursers^o sweep th' ethereal plain, horses
 And bear thee upwards to that blest abode,
 Where, like the prophet, thou shalt find thy God.
 —1773

³ Steeled... my case Wheatley references being stolen from her father's arms by a stoic slave trader unmoved by his abominable task.

To S.M.,¹ a Young African Painter, On Seeing His Works

To show the lab'ring bosom's deep intent,
And thought in living characters to paint,
When first thy pencil did those beauties give,
And breathing figures learnt from thee to live,
5 How did those prospects give my soul delight,
A new creation rushing on my sight?
Still, wond'rous youth! each noble path pursue,
On deathless glories fix thine ardent view:
Still may the painter's and the poet's fire
10 To aid thy pencil, and thy verse conspire!
And may the charms of each seraphic² theme
Conduct thy footsteps to immortal fame!
High to the blissful wonders of the skies
Elate thy soul, and raise thy wishful eyes.
15 Thrice happy, when exalted to survey
That splendid city, crowned with endless day,
Whose twice six gates on radiant hinges ring:
Celestial Salem blooms in endless spring.³

Calm and serene thy moments glide along,
20 And may the muse inspire each future song!
Still, with the sweets of contemplation blessed,
May peace with balmy wings your soul invest!
But when these shades of time are chased away,
And darkness ends in everlasting day,
25 On what seraphic pinions^o shall we move, wings
And view the landscapes in the realms above?
There shall thy tongue in heav'nly murmurs flow,

And there my muse with heav'nly transport glow:
No more to tell of Damon's⁴ tender sighs,
30 Or rising radiance of Aurora's⁵ eyes,
For nobler themes demand a nobler strain,
And purer language on th' ethereal plain.
Cease, gentle muse! the solemn gloom of night
Now seals the fair creation from my sight.
—1773

A Farewell to America. To Mrs. S.W.⁶

1

Adieu, New-England's smiling meads,^o meadows
Adieu, the flow'ry plain:
I leave thine op'ning charms, O spring,
And tempt the roaring main.^o sea

2

5 In vain for me the flow'rets rise,
And boast their gaudy pride,
While here beneath the northern skies
I mourn for health denied.

3

Celestial maid of rosy hue,⁷
10 O let me feel thy reign!
I languish till thy face I view,
Thy vanish'd joys regain.

4

Susanna mourns, nor can I bear
To see the crystal show'r,

¹ S.M. Probably the painter Scipio Moorhead (fl. 1773), a slave owned by a minister in Boston. The engraving of Wheatley reproduced in this anthology is copied from a portrait attributed to him; this engraving is all that is known to survive of his work.

² seraphic Angelic, heavenly; the angels surrounding God's throne are referred to as seraphim.

³ That splendid . . . endless spring Reference to "new Jerusalem," an earthly paradise that, according to Revelation 21, will descend from heaven after the end times. This city experiences no night and is surrounded by twelve gates, each named for one of the twelve tribes of Israel; Salem Another name for Jerusalem.

⁴ Damon Reference to the Greek legend of loyal friends, Damon and Pythias. When Pythias is sentenced to execution, Damon volunteers to stay behind as collateral while his friend makes a last trip home.

⁵ Aurora Roman goddess of the dawn.

⁶ S.W. Susanna Wheatley, the poet's mistress. This poem commemorates Wheatley's transatlantic voyage to London, where she traveled both for her health and to oversee the publication of Poems on Various Subjects, in which this poem was printed. Susanna Wheatley stayed behind in Boston.

⁷ Celestial . . . hue The New England sun.

15 Or mark the tender falling tear
At sad departure's hour;

5
Not unregarding can I see
Her soul with grief oppress:
But let no sighs, no groans for me,
20 Steal from her pensive breast.

6
In vain the feather'd warblers sing,
In vain the garden blooms,
And on the bosom of the spring
Breathes out her sweet perfumes

7
25 While for Britannia's^o distant shore Great Britain's
We sweep the liquid plain,
And with astonish'd eyes explore
The wide-extended main.

8
30 Lo! Health appears! celestial dame!
Complacent and serene,
With Hebe's¹ mantle o'er her Frame,
With soul-delighting mein.^o strength

9
To mark the vale where London lies
With misty vapours crown'd,

35 Which cloud Aurora's² thousand dyes,^o colors
And veil her charms around,

10
Why, Phoebus,³ moves thy car so slow?
So slow thy rising ray?
Give us the famous town to view,
40 Thou glorious king of day!

11
For thee, Britannia, I resign
New-England's smiling fields
To view again her charms divine,
What joy the prospect yields!

12
45 But thou! Temptation hence away,
With all thy fatal train^o consequences
Nor once seduce my soul away,
By thine enchanting strain.^o music

13
Thrice happy they, whose heav'nly shield
50 Secures their souls from harms,
And fell temptation on the field defeat
Of all its pow'r disarms!
—1773

¹ Hebe Greek goddess of youth.

² Aurora Roman goddess of the dawn.

³ Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun.

*To His Excellency General Washington*¹

The following letter and verses were written by the famous Phillis Wheatley, the African Poetess, and presented to his Excellency Gen. Washington.²

Sir,

I have taken the freedom to address your Excellency in the enclosed poem, and entreat your acceptance, though I am not insensible of its inaccuracies. Your being appointed by the Grand Continental Congress to be Generalissimo of the armies of North America, together with the fame of your virtues, excite sensations not easy to suppress. Your generosity, therefore, I presume, will pardon the attempt. Wishing your Excellency all possible success in the great cause you are so generously engaged in. I am,

Your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,
Phillis Wheatley.

Celestial choir! enthroned in realms of light,
Columbia's³ scenes of glorious toils I write.
While freedom's cause her anxious breast alarms,
She flashes dreadful in refulgent^o arms. radiant
See mother earth her offspring's fate bemoan,
And nations gaze at scenes before unknown!
See the bright beams of heaven's revolving light
Involved in sorrows and the veil of night!

¹ To His Excellency General Washington Wheatley sent this poem to George Washington on 26 October 1775. At the time she was in Providence, Rhode Island, having fled there with the Wheatleys during the British Occupation of Boston, and Washington was in Cambridge, Massachusetts, commanding the troops of the colonial army. Washington replied on 28 February 1776, writing, "I thank you most sincerely for your polite notice of me, in the elegant lines you enclosed; and however undeserving I may be of such encomium and panegyrick, the style and manner exhibit a striking proof of your poetical talents." The poem was first published in the Virginia Gazette on 20 March 1776.

The following ... Gen. Washington The poem appears here as it was published in the Pennsylvania Magazine, edited by Thomas Paine (1763–1809)—together with this headnote and Wheatley's letter.

Columbia Personification of America, a term derived from Christopher Columbus. Columbia is the "Goddess" referenced throughout the poem (see line 9).

The goddess comes, she moves divinely fair,
10 Olive and laurel binds her golden hair:
Wherever shines this native of the skies,
Unnumbered charms and recent graces rise.

Muse! Bow propitious^o while my pen favorably relates

How pour her armies through a thousand gates,
15 As when Eolus⁴ heaven's fair face deforms,
Enwrapped in tempest and a night of storms;
Astonished ocean feels the wild uproar, flowing
The refluent^o surges beat the sounding shore;
Or thick as leaves in Autumn's golden reign,
20 Such, and so many, moves the warrior's train.
In bright array they seek the work of war,
Where high unfurled the ensign^o waves in air. flag
Shall I to Washington their praise recite?
Enough thou know'st them in the fields of fight.
Thee, first in peace and honors—we demand
25 The grace and glory of thy martial band.
Famed for thy valour, for thy virtues more,
Hear every tongue thy guardian aid implore!

One century scarce performed its destined round,
30 When Gallic^o powers Columbia's fury found;⁵ French
And so may you, whoever dares disgrace
The land of freedom's heaven-defended race!
Fix'd are the eyes of nations on the scales,
For in their hopes Columbia's arm prevails.
35 Anon Britannia^o droops the pensive head, Great Britain
While round increase the rising hills of dead.
Ah! cruel blindness to Columbia's state!
Lament thy thirst of boundless power too late.

Proceed, great chief, with virtue on thy side,
40 Thy ev'ry action let the goddess guide.
A crown, a mansion, and a throne that shine,
With gold unfading, Washington! Be thine.

—1775

Eolus Aeolus, god of the wind.

Gallic ... found Wheatley references the French and Indian War (1754–63), which pitted Anglo-Americans against France and their Native American allies. It was during this war that Washington initially made his reputation as a military commander.

On the Death of General Wooster¹

From this the muse rich consolation draws
 He nobly perished in his country's cause
 His country's cause that ever fir'd his mind
 Where martial flames, and Christian virtues joined.
 How shall my pen his warlike deeds proclaim
 Or paint them fairer on the list of Fame—
 Enough, great chief—now wrapped in shades around,
 Thy grateful country shall thy praise resound—
 Though not with mortals' empty praise elate^o elevate
 That vainest vapour to th' immortal state
 Inly serene the expiring hero lies
 And thus (while heav'nward roll his swimming eyes):
 "Permit, great power, while yet my fleeting breath
 And spirits wander to the verge of death—
 Permit me yet to point fair freedom's charms
 For her² the continent shines bright in arms,
 By thy high will, celestial prize she came—
 For her we combat on the field of fame
 Without her presence vice maintains full sway
 And social love and virtue wing their way.

O still propitious be thy guardian care
 And lead Columbia³ thro' the toils of war.
 With thine own hand conduct them and defend
 And bring the dreadful contest to an end—
 Forever grateful let them live to thee
 And keep them ever virtuous, brave, and free—
 But how, presumptuous shall we hope to find
 Divine acceptance with th' Almighty mind—
 While yet (O deed ungenerous!) they disgrace
 And hold in bondage Afric's blameless race?
 Let virtue reign—And thou accord^o our prayers grant
 Be victory ours, and generous freedom theirs."
 The hero prayed—the wond'ring spirit fled
 And sought the unknown regions of the dead—
 Tis thine, fair partner of his life,⁴ to find
 His virtuous path and follow close behind—
 A little moment steals him from thy sight
 He waits thy coming to the realms of light
 Freed from his labours in the ethereal skies
 Where in succession endless pleasures rise!
 —1778

On the Death of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield

Phillis Wheatley revised her poems throughout her career and especially for her 1773 book Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral. Many important poems exist in earlier versions, including "To the Right Honourable William, Earl of Dartmouth" and "Farewell to America." One poem that Wheatley significantly revised was the one that first brought her transatlantic fame, her elegy for George Whitefield, the Methodist minister. Whitefield toured the American colonies multiple times, delivering sermons outdoors to thousands of people during the Great Awakening, the surge of interest in Protestantism that occurred in the 1730s and 1740s. He was well known as a philanthropist and advocate for the spiritual equality of black people, although, notably, he was not an abolitionist. Wheatley's elegy circulated as a broadside and was reprinted widely in Britain and North America. Included here are two versions: the first published within weeks of Whitefield's death in 1770, and the later version published in Poems on Various Subjects. In the book version, Wheatley's poem is divorced from its initial context to fit with the other poems in the collection: the long headnote from ¹ General Wooster Wheatley and David Wooster (1710–77), of New Haven, Connecticut, were frequent correspondents in the 1770s. Wooster was a commander during the Revolutionary War, and after he died in battle Wheatley sent this poem to his widow, Mary Wooster (on 15 July 1778). The poem was listed with this title in her proposed second volume of poems, but it was never published in Wheatley's lifetime.

² her Freedom, personified throughout the poem.

³ Columbia Personification of America, after Christopher Columbus.

⁴ fair partner of his life Mary Wooster, to whom Wheatley addressed the poem.

the broadside, included here, was replaced in the book with a brief title and the date of its original publication. Wheatley also shortened the poem by over a dozen lines; made many subtle changes to her language ("Inflame the soul" in line 8, for example, becomes "Inflame the heart"); and cut a passage about the Boston Massacre.

An elegiac poem, on the death of that celebrated divine, and eminent servant of Jesus Christ, the late Reverend, and pious George Whitefield, Chaplain to the Right Honorable the Countess of Huntingdon,¹ &c. &c., who made his exit from this transitory state, to dwell in the celestial realms of bliss, on Lord's Day, 30th of September, 1770, when he was seized with a fit of the asthma, at Newbury-Port, near Boston, in New England. In which is a consolatory address to his truly noble benefactress, the worthy and pious Lady Huntingdon—and the Orphan-Children in Georgia;² who, with many thousands, are left, by the death of this great man, to lament the loss of a father, friend, and benefactor.

By Phillis, a servant girl³ of 17 years of age, belonging to Mr. J. Wheatley, of Boston:—and has been but 9 years in this country from Africa.

Hail happy saint on thy immortal throne!
 To thee complaints of grievance are unknown;
 We hear no more the music of thy tongue,
 Thy wonted° auditories° cease to throng. usual / audiences
 5 Thy lessons in unequalled° accents flowed! unparalleled
 While emulation in each bosom glowed;
 Thou didst, in strains of eloquence refined,
 Inflame the soul, and captivate the mind.
 Unhappy we, the setting sun deplore!
 10 Which once was splendid, but it shines no more.
 He leaves this earth for Heaven's unmeasured height:
 And worlds unknown, receive him from our fight;
 There Whitefield wings, with rapid course his way,
 And sails to Zion,⁴ through vast seas of day.

¹ Countess of Huntingdon Selina Hastings (1707–91), an evangelical who founded the "Huntingdon Connexion," a group of radical Methodists who broke from the Church of England in 1782. Whitefield was her personal chaplain at the time of his death.

² Orphan-Children in Georgia Whitefield founded an orphanage in Bethesda, Georgia, in 1738, and throughout his career solicited funds for its upkeep.

³ servant girl In Boston at this time "servant" was a common euphemism for "slave."

⁴ Zion Heaven, or the promised land.

Hail, happy saint, on thine immortal throne,
 Possessed of glory, life, and bliss unknown;
 We hear no more the music of thy tongue,
 Thy wonted° auditories° cease to throng. usual / audiences
 5 Thy sermons in unequalled° accents flowed, unparalleled
 And ev'ry bosom with devotion glowed;
 Thou didst in strains of eloquence refined
 Inflame the heart, and captivate the mind.
 Unhappy we the setting sun deplore,
 10 So glorious once, but ah! it shines no more.

Behold the prophet in his tow'ring flight!
 He leaves the earth for heav'n's unmeasured height,
 And worlds unknown receive him from our fight.
 There Whitefield wings with rapid course his way,
 15 And sails to Zion⁵ through vast seas of day.

⁵ Zion Heaven, or the promised land.

15 When his Americans were burdened sore,¹
 When streets were crimsoned with their guiltless gore!²
 Unrival'd friendship in his breast now strove:
 The fruit thereof was charity and love
 Towards America—couldst thou do more
 20 Than leave thy native home, the British shore,
 To cross the great Atlantic's wat'ry road,
 To see America's distressed abode?
 Thy prayers, great saint, and thy incessant cries,
 Have pierced the bosom of thy native skies!
 25 Thou moon hast seen, and ye bright stars of light
 Have witness been of his requests by night!
 He prayed that grace in every heart might dwell:
 He longed to see America excel;
 He charged its youth to let the grace divine
 30 Arise, and in their future actions shine;
 He offered that he did himself receive,
 A greater gift not God himself can give:
 He urged the need of Him to every one;
 It was no less than God's co-equal Son!
 35 Take Him ye wretched for your only good;
 Take Him ye starving souls to be your food.
 Ye thirsty, come to this life giving stream:
 Ye preachers, take him for your joyful theme:
 Take Him, "my dear Americans," he said,
 40 Be your complaints in his kind bosom laid:
 Take Him ye Africans, he longs for you;
 Impartial Saviour, is his title due;
 If you will choose to walk in grace's road,
 You shall be sons, and kings, and priests to God.

45 Great Countess! We Americans revere
 Thy name, and thus condole³ thy grief sincere:
 We mourn with thee, that tomb obscurely placed,
 In which thy Chaplain undisturbed doth rest.
 New England sure, doth feel the orphan's smart;⁴
 50 Reveals the true sensations of his heart:

Thy prayers, great saint, and thine incessant cries
 Have pierced the bosom of thy native skies.
 Thou moon hast seen, and all the stars of light,
 How he has wrestled with his God by night.
 20 He prayed that grace in ev'ry heart might dwell,
 He longed to see America excel;
 He charged its youth that ev'ry grace divine
 Should with full lustre in their conduct shine;
 That Saviour, which his soul did first receive,
 25 The greatest gift that ev'n a God can give,
 He freely offered to the num'rous throng,
 That on his lips with list'ning pleasure hung.

"Take him, ye wretched, for your only good,
 Take him ye starving sinners, for your food;
 30 Ye thirsty, come to this life-giving stream,
 Ye preachers, take him for your joyful theme;
 Take him my dear Americans, he said,
 Be your complaints on his kind bosom laid:
 Take him, ye Africans, he longs for you,
 35 Impartial Saviour is his title due:
 Washed in the fountain of redeeming blood,
 You shall be sons, and kings, and priests to God."

Great Countess,⁵ we Americans revere
 Thy name, and mingle in thy grief sincere;
 40 New England deeply feels, the Orphans mourn,
 Their more than father will no more return.

¹ burdened sore Burdened with much suffering.

² streets ... gore A reference to the Boston Massacre on 5 March 1770, which Whitefield condemned. British troops fired without orders into a group of civilians, killing three and setting off a firestorm of anti-British sentiment in the colonies.

³ condole Sympathize with.

⁴ smart Suffering. A reference to the orphanage Whitefield supported in Georgia.

⁵ [Wheatley's note] The Countess of Huntingdon, to whom Mr. Whitefield was Chaplain.

Since this fair Sun, withdraws his golden rays,
 No more to brighten these distressful days!
 His lonely Tabernacle, sees no more
 A Whitefield landing on the British shore:
 55 Then let us view him in yon azure skies:
 Let every mind with this loved object rise.
 No more can he exert his lab'ring breath,
 Seized by the cruel messenger of death.
 What can his dear America return?
 60 But drop a tear upon his happy urn,
 Thou tomb, shalt safe retain thy sacred trust,
 Till life divine re-animate his dust.
 —1770

But, though arrested by the hand of death,
 Whitefield no more exerts his lab'ring breath,
 Yet let us view him in th' eternal skies,
 45 Let ev'ry heart to this bright vision rise;
 While the tomb safe retains its sacred trust,
 Till life divine re-animates his dust.
 —1773

Selected Letters

Phillis Wheatley wrote dozens of letters to friends and acquaintances in New England and abroad. Her correspondents included prominent individuals such as George Washington and Selina Hastings, the Countess of Huntingdon, as well as Obour Tanner, an enslaved African woman who lived in Newport, Rhode Island, and Samson Occom, the Mohegan minister.

TO OBOUR TANNER, IN NEW-PORT [RHODE ISLAND]

19 May 1772
 Boston

Dear Sister

I received your favour of February 6th for which I give you my sincere thanks. I greatly rejoice with you in that realizing view, and I hope experience, of the saving change which you so emphatically describe. Happy were it for us if we could arrive to that evangelical repentance, and the true holiness of heart which you mention. Inexpressibly happy should we be could we have a due sense of beauties and excellence of the crucified Saviour. In his crucifixion may be seen marvelous displays of grace and love, sufficient to draw and invite us to the rich and endless treasures of his mercy; let us rejoice in and adore the wonders of God's infinite love in bringing us from a land semblant of¹ darkness itself, and where the divine light of revelation (being obscured) is as darkness.² Here, the knowledge of the true God and eternal life are made manifest; but there, profound ignorance overshadows the land. Your observation is true, namely, that there was nothing in us to recommend us to God. Many of our fellow creatures are passed by, when the bowels of divine love expanded towards us. May this goodness & long suffering of God lead us to unfeigned repentance.

It gives me very great pleasure to hear of so many of my nation,³ seeking with eagerness the way to true felicity. O may we all meet at length in that happy mansion. I hope the correspondence between us will continue, (my being much indisposed this winter past was the reason of my not answering yours before now) which correspondence I hope may have the happy effect of improving our mutual friendship. Till we meet in the regions of consummate blessedness, let us endeavor by the assistance of divine grace, to live the life, and we shall die the death of the righteous. May this be our happy case and of those who are travelling to the region of felicity,⁴ is the earnest request of your affectionate

Friend and humble servant, Phillis Wheatley

¹ semblant of Resembling.

² is as darkness Here Wheatley touches on the irony that her enslavement has also provided access to Christian revelation. See also her poem "On Being Brought from Africa to America."

³ of my nation Of African descent.

⁴ the region of felicity Heaven.

TO SELINA HASTINGS, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON¹

27 June 1773

London

It is with pleasure I acquaint your Ladyship of my safe arrival in London after a fine passage of five weeks, in the ship London with my young master (advised by my physicians for my health) have brought a letter from Richard Carey,² Esquire, but was disappointed by your absence of the honour of waiting upon your Ladyship with it. I would have enclosed it, but was doubtful of the safety of the conveyance.

I should think my self very happy in seeing your Ladyship, and if you was so desirous of the image of the author as to propose it for a frontispiece I flatter myself that you would accept the reality.³

I conclude with thanking your ladyship for permitting the dedication⁴ of my poems to you; and am not insensible, that, under the patronage of your Ladyship, not more eminent in the station of life than in your exemplary piety and virtue, my feeble efforts will be shielded from the severe trials of un pitying criticism and, being encouraged by your Ladyship's indulgence, I the more freely resign to the world these juvenile productions, and am Madam, with greatest humility, your dutiful humble servant,

Phillis Wheatley

TO COLONEL DAVID WOOSTER,⁵

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT

18 October 1773

Boston

Sir,

[...] I take the freedom to transmit to you, a short sketch of my voyage and return from London where I went for the recovery of my health as advised by my physician. I was received in England with such kindness, complaisance,⁶ and so many marks of esteem and real friendship as astonishes me on the reflection, for I was no more than 6 weeks there.—Was introduced to Lord Dartmouth and had near half an hour conversation with his Lordship, with whom was Alderman Kirkman.⁷—Then to Lord Lincoln, who visited me at my own Lodgings with the famous Dr. Solander,⁸ who accompanied Mr. Banks in his late expedition around the world.

Then to Lady Cavendish, and Lady Carteret Webb,—Mrs. Palmer a poetess, an accomplished Lady.—Dr. Thos. Gibbons, Rhetoric Professor, To Israel Maudit, Esquire, Benjamin Franklin, Esquire, F.R.S., Granville Sharp,⁹ Esquire, who attended me to the Tower¹⁰ and showed the lions, panthers, tigers, etc., the horse armoury, small armoury, the crowns, sceptres, diadems, the font for

⁵ DAVID WOOSTER Army general (1711–77) who fought for the British in the French and Indian War (1754–63) and then for the United States in the Revolution. He died in battle in 1777; see Wheatley's poem, "On the Death of General Wooster" (above).

⁶ complaisance Politeness.

⁷ Lord Dartmouth William Legge (1731–1801), Second Earl of Dartmouth, in 1772 appointed Secretary of State for the Colonies by Lord North (1732–92); see Wheatley's poem addressed to him, above; Alderman Kirkman John Kirkman (1741–80), an alderman of the city of London.

⁸ Dr. Solander Daniel Solander (1736–82), a botanist who accompanied Joseph Banks (1743–1820) on a voyage to the South Pacific.

⁹ Mrs. Palmer Mary Reynolds Palmer (1716–96), sister of Sir Joshua Reynolds (1723–92); Israel Maudit (1708–87), an agent in London for the State of Massachusetts; Benjamin Franklin North American political leader (1706–90) and at the time an agent for the colonies in Britain; F.R.S. Fellow of the Royal Society; Granville Sharp British abolitionist (1735–1813).

¹⁰ the Tower The Tower of London, medieval castle of the kings of England. By the eighteenth century it had acquired its modern function as a public museum. The other places mentioned in the letter were popular tourist sites at the time.

¹ Selina Hastings ... Huntingdon Evangelical (1707–91) who founded the "Huntingdon Connexion," a group of radical Methodists who broke from the Church of England in 1782. Wheatley wrote this letter soon after she arrived in London, where she had traveled for her health and to oversee the publication of Poems on Various Subjects.

² Richard Carey An acquaintance of the Wheatley family and correspondent of the Countess of Huntingdon who wrote a letter of introduction for the poet.

³ image ... the reality The Countess of Huntingdon had herself suggested that an engraved image of the author appear as the frontispiece to Poems on Various Subjects. Wheatley left Great Britain before the two had a chance to meet in person.

⁴ the dedication In agreeing to have Poems on Various Subjects dedicated to her, the Countess of Huntingdon publically endorsed Wheatley as a poet.

Christening the royal family. Saw Westminster Abbey, British Museum, Cox's Museum, Saddler's Wells, Greenwich Hospital, Park and Chapel, the royal observatory at Greenwich, etc., etc., too many things and places to trouble you with in a letter.—The Earl of Dartmouth made me a compliment¹ of 5 guineas, and desired me to get the whole of Mr. Pope's² Works, as the best he could recommend to my perusal, this I did, also got Hudibras, Don Quixote, and *Gay's Fables*³—was presented with a folio edition of Milton's Paradise Lost,⁴ printed on a silver type, so called from its elegance, (I suppose) by Mr. Brook Watson,⁵ whose coat of arms is prefixed.—Since my return to America my master, has at the desire of my friends in England given me my freedom. The instrument is drawn, so as to secure me and my property from the hands of executors, administrators, etc., of my master,⁶ and secure whatsoever should be given me as my own. A copy is sent to Israel Maudit, Esquire, F.R.S.

I expect my books which are published in London in Capt. Hall,⁷ who will be here I believe in 8 or 10 days. I beg the favour that you would honor the enclosed proposals,⁸ and use your interest with gentlemen and ladies of your acquaintance to subscribe also, for the more subscribers there are, the more it will be for my advantage, as I am to have half the sale of the books.⁹ This I am the more solicitous for, as I am now upon my own footing and whatever I get by this is entirely mine, and it is the chief I have to depend upon.¹⁰ I must also request you would desire the printers in New Haven not to reprint that book, as it will be a great hurt to me, preventing any further benefit that I might receive from the sale of my copies from England.¹¹ The price is 2/6d [two shillings, six pence] bound or 2 [shillings]/Sterling sewed.¹² If any should be so ungenerous as to reprint them the genuine copy may be known, for it is signed and in my own handwriting.¹³ My dutiful respects attend your Lady and children and I am ever respectfully your obliged humble servant,

Phillis Wheatley

TO OBOUR TANNER, IN NEW-PORT [RHODE ISLAND]

30 October 1773

Boston

Dear Obour,

I received your most kind epistles of August 27th and October 13th by a young man of your acquaintance, for which I am obliged to you. I hear of your welfare with pleasure; but this acquaints you that I am at present indisposed by a cold, and since my arrival¹⁴ have been visited by the asthma.

⁹ sale of the books Profit from the sale of the books.

¹⁰ I am ... depend upon Now, as a free woman, Wheatley supported herself partly through her writing.

¹¹ copies from England Colonial printers commonly issued unauthorized reprints of books published originally in Britain. Wheatley here pleads with Wooster to help prevent such piracy in New Haven.

¹² bound ... sewed Two ways in which books were prepared for purchase; books bought "sewed" were often subsequently bound by their owners.

¹³ handwriting Wheatley apparently signed each authorized copy of her book to distinguish it from pirated texts. Poems on Various Subjects was not reprinted in North America until 1786, two years after Wheatley's death.

¹⁴ acquaints Informs; arrival Return from London in September 1773.

¹ compliment Gift.

² Mr. Pope Alexander Pope (1688–1744), eighteenth-century British poet. Pope's work was an important influence on Wheatley long before it was recommended that she purchase this complete edition of his works for herself.

³ Hudibras Poem by Samuel Butler (1612–80); Don Quixote Novel (1605/15) by Miguel de Cervantes (1547–1616); Gay's Fables Poems for children by John Gay (1685–1732).

⁴ Paradise Lost Epic poem by John Milton, originally published in 1667. A folio edition was a large-format, expensive publication.

⁵ Brook Watson Merchant (1735–1807) and eventual Lord Mayor of London (1796–97).

⁶ instrument Manumission paper guaranteeing Wheatley's freedom; secure ... my master Wheatley is careful to document and secure her freedom in case her status is questioned after John Wheatley's death. As personal property, slaves were at the mercy of their master's heirs or executors and were often sold for profit or to settle debts.

⁷ my books The volume Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, published by Archibald Bell in 1773; in Capt. Hall I.e., the ship commanded by Captain Hall, in which Wheatley expected her poems to be delivered across the Atlantic.

⁸ proposals Advertisements encouraging buyers to "subscribe," i.e., pay a deposit ahead of time, for the book.

Your observations on our dependence on the Deity, and your hopes that my wants will be supplied from his fullness which is in Christ Jesus, is truly worthy of yourself.—I can't say but my voyage to England has conduced to¹ the recovery (in a great measure) of my health. The friends I found there among the nobility and the gentry, their benevolent conduct towards me, the unexpected, and unmerited civility and complaisance² with which I was treated by all, fills me with astonishment. I can scarcely realize³ it.—This I humbly hope has the happy effect of lessening me in my own esteem. Your reflections on the sufferings of the Son of God, and the inestimable price of our immortal souls, plainly demonstrate the sensations of a soul united to Jesus. What you observe of Esau⁴ is true of all mankind, who, (left to themselves) would sell their heavenly birthrights for a few moments of sensual pleasure whose wages at last (dreadful wages!) is eternal condemnation. Dear Obour let us not sell our birthright for a thousand worlds, which indeed would be as dust upon the balance.—The God of the seas and dry land, has graciously brought me home in safety. Join with me in thanks to him for so great a mercy, and that it may excite me to praise him with cheerfulness, to preserve in grace and faith, and in the knowledge of our Creator and Redeemer,—that my heart may be filled with gratitude. . . .

most affectionately ever yours,
Phillis Wheatley

TO SAMSON OCCOM

Samson Occom (1723–92) was a Mohegan and an ordained clergyman who toured North America preaching with George Whitefield. He often lodged with the Wheatleys during visits to Boston. In the 1760s Occom traveled to Great Britain and like Wheatley was patronized by Selina Hastings (1707–91), the Countess of Huntingdon. During his life, Occom published a sermon and a book of hymns; he also wrote an autobiography that was published after his death. A frequent correspondent of the Wheatley family, including Phillis, Occom also helped sell Wheatley's book of poems in 1773. The letter below from Wheatley to Occom is her most direct condemnation of the institution of slavery in the name of natural rights and liberty. It was reprinted in newspapers throughout New England (and is reprinted here with the headnote that accompanied it in such publications).

The following is an extract of a letter from Phillis, a Negro Girl of Mr. Wheatley's,⁵ in Boston, to the Rev. Samson Occom, which we are desired to insert as a specimen of her ingenuity.—It is dated 11th Feb., 1774.

Revered and honored Sir,

I have this day received your obliging kind epistle, and am greatly satisfied with your reasons respecting the Negroes, and think highly reasonable what you offer in vindication of their natural rights: Those that invade them cannot be insensible that the divine light is chasing away the thick darkness which broods over the land of Africa; and the chaos which has reigned so long, is converting into beautiful order, and reveals more and more clearly, the glorious dispensation of civil and religious liberty, which are so inseparably united, that there is little or no enjoyment of one without the other: otherwise, perhaps, the Israelites had been less solicitous for their freedom from Egyptian slavery;⁶ I don't say they would have been contented without it, by no means, for in every human breast, God has implanted a principle, which we call love of freedom; it is impatient of oppression, and pants for deliverance; and by the leave of our modern Egyptians⁷ I will assert, that the same principle lives in us. God grant deliverance in his own way and time, and get him

¹ conduced to Aided in.

² complaisance Politeness.

³ realize Believe in the reality of.

⁴ Esau In Genesis 25.29–34, Esau sold his birthright to his brother Jacob for bread and pottage.

⁵ Negro Girl of Mr. Wheatley's This description implies that Phillis was still a slave, but in fact she had been granted her freedom months earlier.

⁶ Egyptian slavery Reference to the book of Exodus, in which Moses liberates the Jews from slavery in Egypt.

⁷ modern Egyptians People of African descent. In Wheatley's time Egypt often stood metonymically for the entire continent of Africa.

honour upon all those whose avarice impels them to countenance and help forward the calamities of their fellow creatures. This I desire not for their hurt, but to convince them of the strange absurdity of their conduct whose words and actions are so diametrically opposite.

How well the cry for liberty, and the reverse disposition for the exercise of oppressive power over others agree,—I humbly think it does not require the penetration of a philosopher to determine.—

IN CONTEXT

Preface to Phillis Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773)

Phillis Wheatley's publishers included extensive introductory material to convince readers that she was in fact the author of the poems that followed. Such material included a letter from John Wheatley, her master, and an attestation signed by more than a dozen prominent citizens of Boston. Prefaces like this were not unusual for texts written by unlikely authors; when Poems, on Several Occasions (1785) appeared, by Wheatley's contemporary Anne Yearsley, a poor "milkwoman," the volume featured a preface by Hannah More. Nevertheless, the stakes were different for black authors who faced a predominantly racist society who thought them unequal to the task of expressing imaginative thoughts in writing. More than half a century later, this practice still continued; Frederick Douglass's Narrative (1845), for example, featured two prefaces by white patrons and sponsors, the abolitionists William Lloyd Garrison and Wendell Phillips.

The following is a Copy of a Letter sent by the Author's Master to the Publisher.

Phillis was brought from Africa to America, in the Year 1761, between seven and eight years of age. Without any assistance from school education, and by only what she was taught in the family, she, in sixteen months' time from her arrival, attained the English language, to which she was an utter stranger before, to such a degree, as to read any, the most difficult parts of the sacred writings, to the great astonishment of all who heard her.

As to her writing, her own curiosity led her to it; and this she learnt in so short a time, that in the year 1765, she wrote a letter to the Rev. Mr. Occom,¹ the Indian minister, while in England.

She has a great inclination to learn the Latin tongue, and has made some progress in it. This relation is given by her master who bought her and with whom she now lives.

John Wheatley.
Boston, 14 November 1772.

To the Public

As it has been repeatedly suggested to the publisher, by persons, who have seen the manuscript, that numbers would be ready to suspect they were not really the writings of Phillis, he has procured the following attestation, from the most respectable characters in Boston, that none might have the least ground for disputing their original.

¹ Mr. Occom Samson Occom (1723–92), Mohegan minister, who toured England in the 1760s. This early letter does not survive.

We whose names are under-written, do assure the world, that the poems specified in the following Page,¹ were (as we verily believe) written by Phillis, a young Negro girl, who was but a few years since, brought an uncultivated barbarian² from Africa, as has ever since been, and now is, under the disadvantage of serving as a slave in a family in this town. She has been examined by some of the best judges,³ and is thought qualified to write them.

His Excellency THOMAS HUTCHINSON, Governor,
The Hon. ANDREW OLIVER, Lieutenant-Governor.

The Hon. Thomas Hubbard,	The Rev. Charles Cheuney, D.D. ⁴
The Hon. John Erving,	The Rev. Mather Byles, D.D.
The Hon. James Pitts,	The Rev. Ed. Pemberton, D.D.
The Hon. Harrison Gray,	The Rev. Andrew Elliot, D.D.
The Hon. James Bowdoin,	The Rev. Samuel Cooper, D.D.
John Hancock, Esq;	The Rev. Samuel Mather, D.D.
Joseph Green, Esq;	The Rev. Mr. John Moorhead,
Richard Carey, Esq;	Mr. John Wheatley, her Master.

N.B. The original attestation, signed by the above gentlemen, may be seen by applying to Archibald Bell, Bookseller, No. 8, Aldgate-Street.

IN CONTEXT

Reactions to Phillis Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773)

The Afro-British writer Ignatius Sancho (1729?–80) was born during the middle passage on a slave ship crossing the Atlantic from Africa to the British West Indies. He was soon brought to England and granted his freedom, eventually serving as butler and valet to the dukes of Montagu before opening a grocery store in London in 1774. He prospered financially and is the only known eighteenth-century Afro-Briton who met gender and property qualifications

¹ [original note] The words “following page” allude to the contents of the manuscript copy, which were wrote at the back of the above attestation.

² uncultivated barbarian Uncivilized and uncultured, without the connotation of rudeness or violence (as in modern usage).

³ examined ... judges Most notable among the signatories are: Thomas Hutchinson (1711–80), Governor of Massachusetts; Andrew Oliver (1706–74), Lieutenant Governor; Thomas Hubbard (1702–73), at the time treasurer of Harvard College; James Bowdoin (1726–90), future Governor of Massachusetts for whom Bowdoin college would be named; John Hancock (1737–93), famous signatory of the Declaration of Independence; Samuel Cooper (1725–83), minister of the Brattle Street Congregational Church; Samuel Mather (1706–85), son of Cotton Mather (1663–1728), prominent Puritan minister; and John Moorhead (1703–73), employer of Scipio Moorhead, the African painter to whom Wheatley addressed a poem in 1772 (see above).

⁴ D.D. Doctor of Divinity.

to vote for Parliament. After his death an edition of his correspondence was published in London as Letters of the Late Ignatius Sancho, An African (1782). Sancho was often paired with Phillis Wheatley in discussions about the intellectual abilities of Africans. Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826), who owned Wheatley's and Sancho's books, dismissed both authors in Notes on the State of Virginia (1784).

The racist terms with which Jefferson discusses the difference between blacks and whites in general, and the writings of Wheatley and Sancho in particular, provide a sense of the hostile context in which Wheatley's writings were predominantly received.

Letter from Ignatius Sancho to Jabez Fisher, in Philadelphia

27 January 1778
London

Full heartily and most cordially do I thank thee—good Mr. Fisher, for your kindness in sending the books¹—that upon the unchristian and most diabolical usage of my brother Negroes—the illegality—the horrid wickedness of the traffic—the cruel carnage and depopulation of the human species—is painted in such strong colours—that I should think would (if duly attended to) flash² conviction—and produce remorse in every enlightened and candid reader. The perusal affected me more than I can express...

Phyllis's poems do credit to nature—and put art—merely as art—to the blush.—It reflects nothing either to the glory or generosity of her master—if she is still his slave³—except he glories in the low vanity of having in his wanton power a mind animated by Heaven—a genius superior to himself—the list of splendid—titled—learned names,⁴ in confirmation of her being the real authoress.—alas! shews how very poor the acquisition of wealth and knowledge are—without generosity—feeling—and humanity. These good great folks—all know—and perhaps admired—nay, praised genius in bondage—and then, like the priests and the Levites in sacred wit, passed by—not one good Samaritan⁵ amongst them. ...

Ignatius Sancho

from Thomas Jefferson, Notes on the State of Virginia (1784)

The first difference⁶ which strikes us is that of color. ... [T]he difference is fixed in nature, and is as real as if its seat and cause were better known to us. And is this difference of no importance? Is it not the foundation of a greater or less share of beauty in the two races? Are not the fine mixtures of red and white, the expressions of every passion by greater or less suffusions of colour in the one, preferable to that eternal monotony, which reigns in the countenances, that immoveable veil of black

¹ the books Along with Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Jabez Fisher probably sent Sancho anti-slavery books by authors such as Anthony Benezet (1713–84) and Granville Sharpe (1735–1813).

² flash Strike down like lightning.

³ his slave Sancho was unaware that Wheatley had been manumitted in 1773.

⁴ learned names Those individuals who signed the attestation of Wheatley's authorship, printed as a preface to Wheatley's book (see above).

⁵ good Samaritan See Luke 10.30–37.

The first difference I.e., between blacks and whites.

which covers all the emotions of the other race? Add to these, flowing hair, a more elegant symmetry of form, their own judgment in favour of the whites, declared by their preference of them, as uniformly as is the preference of the Oranootan for the black women over those of his own species... Comparing them by their faculties of memory, reason, and imagination, it appears to me, that in memory they are equal to the whites; in reason much inferior, as I think one could scarcely be found capable of tracing and comprehending the investigations of Euclid;¹ and that in imagination they are dull, tasteless, and anomalous. It would be unfair to follow them to Africa for this investigation. We will consider them here, on the same stage with the whites, and where the facts are not apocryphal on which a judgment is to be formed. It will be right to make great allowances for the difference of condition, of education, of conversation, of the sphere in which they move. Many millions of them have been brought to, and born in America. Most of them indeed have been confined to tillage, to their own homes, and their own society: yet many have been so situated, that they might have availed themselves of the conversation of their masters; many have been brought up to the handicraft arts, and from that circumstance have always been associated with the whites. Some have been liberally educated, and all have lived in countries where the arts and sciences are cultivated to a considerable degree, and have had before their eyes samples of the best works from abroad. The Indians, with no advantages of this kind, will often carve figures on their pipes not destitute of design and merit. They will crayon out an animal, a plant, or a country, so as to prove the existence of a germ in their minds which only wants cultivation. They astonish you with strokes of the most sublime oratory; such as prove their reason and sentiment strong, their imagination glowing and elevated. But never yet could I find that a black had uttered a thought above the level of plain narration; never see even an elementary trait of painting or sculpture. In music they are more generally gifted than the whites with accurate ears for tune and time, and they have been found capable of imagining a small catch.² Whether they will be equal to the composition of a more extensive run of melody, or of complicated harmony, is yet to be proved. Misery is often the parent of the most affecting touches in poetry.—Among the blacks is misery enough, God knows, but no poetry. Love is the peculiar oestrum of³ the poet. Their love is ardent, but it kindles the senses only, not the imagination. Religion indeed has produced a Phyllis Whately [sic]; but it could not produce a poet. The compositions published under her name are below the dignity of criticism. ... Ignatius Sancho has approached nearer to merit in composition; yet his letters do more honour to the heart than the head. They breathe the purest effusions of friendship and general philanthropy, and shew how great a degree of the latter may be compounded with strong religious zeal. ... But his imagination is wild and extravagant, escapes incessantly from every restraint of reason and taste, and, in the course of its vagaries, leaves a tract of thought as incoherent and eccentric, as is the course of a meteor through the sky.

¹ Euclid Greek mathematician (fl. 300 BCE).

² catch Short song performed in a round, with three people singing the same melody at different times to create harmonies.

³ oestrum of Inspiration or incitement for.

READING POETRY

WHAT IS A POEM?

Most of us know what a poem is when we see one. Still, even poets find it difficult to define a poem, or poetry. In a lecture on “The Name and Nature of Poetry” (1933), the English poet A.E. Housman stated that he could “no more define poetry than a terrier can define a rat”; however, he added, “we both recognize the object by the symptoms which it provokes in us.” Housman knew he was in the presence of poetry if he experienced a shiver down the spine, or “a constriction of the throat and a precipitation of water to the eyes.” Implicit in Housman’s response is a recognition that we have to go beyond mere formal characteristics—stanzas, rhymes, rhythms—if we want to know what poetry is, or why it differs from prose. Poetry both represents and creates emotions in a highly condensed way. Therefore, any definition of the genre needs to consider, as much as possible, the impact of poetry on us as readers or listeners.

Worth consideration too is the role of the listener or reader not only as passive recipient of a poem, but also as an active participant in its performance. Poetry is among other things the locus for a communicative exchange. A section below deals with the sub-genre of performance poetry, but in a very real sense all poetry is subject to performance. Poems are to be read aloud as well as on the page, and both in sensing meaning and in expressing sound the reader plays a vital role in bringing a poem to life, no matter how long dead its author may be; as W.H. Auden wrote memorably of his fellow poet W.B. Yeats, “the words of a dead man / Are modified in the guts of the living.”

For some readers, poetry is, in William Wordsworth’s phrase, “the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge” (“Preface” to the Lyrical Ballads). They look to poetry for insights into the nature of human experience, and expect elevated thought in carefully wrought language. In contrast, other readers distrust poetry that seems moralistic or didactic. “We hate poetry that has a palpable design upon us,” wrote John Keats to his friend J.H. Reynolds; rather, poetry should be “great & unobtrusive, a thing which enters into one’s soul, and does not startle it or amaze it with itself but with its subject.” The American poet Archibald MacLeish took Keats’s idea a step further: in his poem “Ars Poetica” he suggested that “A poem should not mean / But be.” MacLeish was not suggesting that a poem should lack meaning, but rather that meaning should inhere in the poem’s expressive and sensuous qualities, not in some explicit statement or versified idea.

Whatever we look for in a poem, the infinitude of forms, styles, and subjects that make up the body of literature we call “poetry” is, in the end, impossible to capture in a definition that would satisfy all readers. All we can do, perhaps, is to agree that a poem is a discourse that is characterized by a heightened attention to language, form, and rhythm, by an expressiveness that works through figurative rather than literal modes, and by a capacity to stimulate our imagination and arouse our feelings.

THE LANGUAGE OF POETRY

To speak of “the language of poetry” implies that poets make use of a vocabulary that is somehow different from the language of everyday life. In fact, all language has the capacity to be “poetic,” if by poetry we understand a use of language to which some special importance is attached. The ritualistic utterances of religious ceremonies sometimes have this force; so do the skipping rhymes of children in the schoolyard. We can distinguish such uses of language from the kind of writing we find in, say, a computer user's manual: the author of the manual can describe a given function in a variety of ways, whereas the magic of the skipping rhyme can be invoked only by getting the right words in the right order. So with the poet: he or she chooses particular words in a particular order; the way the poet speaks is as important to our understanding as what is said. This doesn't mean that an instruction manual couldn't have poetic qualities—indeed, modern poets have created “found” poems from even less likely materials—but it does mean that in poetry there is an intimate relation amongst language, form, and meaning, and that the writer deliberately structures and manipulates language to achieve very particular ends.

THE BEST WORDS IN THE BEST ORDER

Wordsworth provides us with a useful example of the way that poetry can invest quite ordinary words with a high emotional charge:

No motion has she now, no force,
 She neither hears nor sees;
 Rolled round in earth's diurnal course
 With rocks, and stones, and trees.

To paraphrase the content of this stanza from “A Slumber Did My Spirit Seal,” “she” is dead and buried. But the language and structures used here give this prosaic idea great impact. For example, the regular iambic meter of the two last lines conveys something of the inexorable motion of the earth and of Lucy embedded in it; the monosyllabic last line is a grim reminder of her oneness with objects in nature; the repeated negatives in the first two lines drive home the irreparable destructiveness of death; the alliteration in the third and fourth lines gives a tangible suggestion of roundness, circularity, repetition in terms of the earth's shape and motion, suggesting a cycle in which death is perhaps followed by renewal. Even the unusual word “diurnal” (which would not have seemed so unusual to Wordsworth's readers) seems “right” in this context; it lends more weight to the notion of the earth's perpetual movement than its mundane synonym “daily” (which, besides, would not scan here). It is difficult to imagine a change of any kind to these lines; they exemplify another attempted definition of poetry, this time by Wordsworth's friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge: “the best words in the best order” (Table Talk, 1827).

POETIC DICTION AND THE ELEVATED STYLE

Wordsworth's diction in the “Lucy” poem cited above is a model of clarity; he has chosen language that, in its simplicity and bluntness, conveys the strength of the speaker's feelings far more strongly than an elaborate description of grief in more conventionally “poetic” language might have done. Wordsworth, disturbed by what he felt was a deadness and artificiality in the poetry of his day, sought to “choose incidents and situations from common life” and to describe them in “a selection of language really used by men” (“Preface” to Lyrical Ballads). His plan might seem an implicit reproach of the “raised” style, the elevated diction of epic poetry we associate with John Milton's Paradise Lost:

Anon out of the earth a fabric huge
 Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
 Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,

Built like a temple, where pilasters round
 Were set, and Doric pillars overlaid
 With golden architrave; nor did there want
 Cornice or frieze, with bossy sculptures graven;
 The roof was fretted gold.

(Paradise Lost I.710–17)

At first glance this passage, with its Latinate vocabulary and convoluted syntax, might seem guilty of inflated language and pretentiousness. However, Milton's description of the devils' palace in Hell deliberately seeks to distance us from its subject in order to emphasize the scale and sublimity of the spectacle, far removed from ordinary human experience. In other words, language and style in Paradise Lost are well adapted to suit a particular purpose, just as they are in "A Slumber Did My Spirit Seal," though on a wholly different scale. Wordsworth criticized the poetry of his day, not because of its elevation, but because the raised style was too often out of touch with its subject; in his view, the words did not bear any significant relation to the "truths" they were attempting to depict.

"PLAIN" LANGUAGE IN POETRY

Since Wordsworth's time, writers have been conscious of a need to narrow the apparent gap between "poetic" language and the language of everyday life. In much of the poetry of the past century, especially free verse, we can observe a growing approximation to speech—even to conversation—in the diction and rhythms of poetry. This may have something to do with the changed role of the poet, who today has discarded the mantle of teacher or prophet that was assumed by poets of earlier times, and who is ready to admit all fields of experience and endeavor as appropriate for poetry. The modern poet looks squarely at life, and can often find a provoking beauty in even the meanest of objects.

We should not assume, however, that a greater concern with the "ordinary," with simplicity, naturalness, and clarity, means a reduction in complexity or suggestiveness. A piece such as Stevie Smith's "Mother, Among the Dustbins," for all the casual and playful domesticity of some of its lines, skillfully evokes a range of emotions and sense impressions defying simple paraphrase.

IMAGERY, SYMBOLISM, AND FIGURES OF SPEECH

The language of poetry is grounded in the objects and phenomena that create sensory impressions. Sometimes the poet renders these impressions quite literally, in a series of images that seek to recreate a scene in the reader's mind:

Only a man harrowing clods
 In a slow silent walk
 With an old horse that stumbles and nods
 Half asleep as they stalk.

Only thin smoke without flame
 From the heaps of couch-grass;
 Yet this will go onward the same
 Though Dynasties pass.

Yonder a maid and her wight
 Come whispering by:
 War's annals will cloud into night
 Ere their story die.

(Thomas Hardy, "In Time of 'The Breaking of Nations'")

Here, the objects of everyday life are re-created with sensory details designed to evoke in us the sensations or responses felt by the speaker viewing the scene. At the same time, the writer invests the objects with such significance that the poem's meaning extends beyond the literal to the symbolic: that is, the images come to stand for something much larger than the objects they represent. Hardy's poem moves from the presentation of stark images of rural life to a sense of their timelessness. By the last stanza we see the ploughman, the burning grass, and the maid and her companion as symbols of recurring human actions and motives that defy the struggles and conflicts of history.

IMAGISM

The juxtaposition of clear, forceful images is associated particularly with the Imagist movement that flourished at the beginning of the twentieth century. Its chief representatives (in their early work) were the American poets H.D. and Ezra Pound, who defined an image as "that which represents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time." Pound's two-line poem "In a Station of the Metro" provides a good example of the Imagists' goal of representing emotions or impressions through the use of concentrated images:

The apparition of these faces in the crowd,
 Petals on a wet, black bough.

As in a Japanese haiku, a form that strongly influenced the Imagists, the poem uses sharp, clear, concrete details to evoke both a sensory impression and the emotion or the atmosphere of the scene. Though the Imagist movement itself lasted only a short time (from about 1912 to 1917), it had a far-reaching influence on modern poets such as T.S. Eliot and William Carlos Williams.

FIGURES OF SPEECH

Imagery often works together with figurative expression to extend and deepen the meaning or impact of a poem. "Figurative" language means language that is metaphorical, not literal or referential. Through "figures of speech" such as metaphor and simile, metonymy, synecdoche, and personification, the writer may alter the ordinary, denotative meanings of words in order to convey greater force and vividness to ideas or impressions, often by showing likenesses between unlike things.

With simile, the poet makes an explicit comparison between the subject (called the tenor) and another object or idea (known as the vehicle), using "as" or "like":

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free,
 The holy time is quiet as a Nun
 Breathless with adoration. ...

In this opening to a sonnet, Wordsworth uses a visual image of a nun in devout prayer to convey in concrete terms the less tangible idea of evening as a “holy time.” The comparison also introduces an emotional dimension, conveying something of the feeling that the scene induces in the poet. The simile can thus illuminate and expand meaning in a compact way. The poet may also extend the simile to elaborate at length on any points of likeness.

In metaphor, the comparison between tenor and vehicle is implied: connectives such as “like” are omitted, and a kind of identity is created between the subject and the term with which it is being compared. Thus in John Donne’s “The Good-Morrow,” a lover asserts the endless joy that he and his beloved find in each other:

My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,
And true plain hearts do in the faces rest;
Where can we find two better hemispheres,
Without sharp north, without declining west?

Here the lovers are transformed into “hemispheres,” each of them a half of the world not subject to the usual natural phenomena of wintry cold (“sharp north”) or the coming of night (“declining west”). Thus, they form a perfect world in balance, in which the normal processes of decay or decline have been arrested. Donne renders the abstract idea of a love that defies change in pictorial and physical terms, making it more real and accessible to us. The images here are all the more arresting for the degree of concentration involved; it is not merely the absence of “like” or “as” that gives the metaphor such direct power, but the fusion of distinct images and emotions into a new idea.

Personification is the figure of speech in which the writer endows abstract ideas, inanimate objects, or animals with human characteristics. In other words, it is a type of implied metaphorical comparison in which aspects of a non-human subject are compared to the feelings, appearance, or actions of a human being. In the second stanza of his ode “To Autumn,” Keats personifies the concept of autumnal harvesting in the form of a woman, “sitting careless on a granary floor, / Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind.” Personification may also help to create a mood, as when Thomas Gray attributes human feelings to a hooting owl in “Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard”; using such words as “moping” and “complain,” Gray invests the bird’s cries with the quality of human melancholy:

... from yonder ivy-mantled tow’r
The moping owl does to the moon complain
Of such, as wand’ring near her secret bow’r,
Molest her ancient solitary reign.

In his book Modern Painters (1856), the English critic John Ruskin criticized such attribution of human feelings to objects in nature. Calling this device the “pathetic fallacy,” he objected to what he saw as an irrational distortion of reality, producing “a falseness in all our impressions of external things.” Modern criticism, with a distrust of any notions of an objective “reality,” tends to use Ruskin’s term as a neutral label simply to describe instances of extended personification of natural objects.

Apostrophe, which is closely related to personification, has the speaker directly addressing a non-human object or idea as if it were a sentient human listener. Blake’s “The Sick Rose,” Shelley’s “Ode to the West Wind,” and his ode “To a Sky-Lark” all employ apostrophe, personifying the object addressed. Keats’s “Ode on a Grecian Urn” begins by apostrophizing the urn (“Thou still unravish’d bride of quietness”), then addresses it in a series of questions and reflections through which the speaker attempts to unravel the urn's mysteries.

Apostrophe also appeals to or addresses a person who is absent or dead. W.H. Auden's lament "In Memory of W.B. Yeats" apostrophizes both the earth in which Yeats is to be buried ("Earth, receive an honoured guest") and the dead poet himself ("Follow, poet, follow right / To the bottom of the night ..."). Religious prayers offer an illustration of the usefulness of apostrophe, since they are direct appeals from an earth-bound supplicant to an invisible god. The suggestion of strong emotion associated with such appeals is a common feature of apostrophe in poetry also, especially poetry with a religious theme, like Donne's "Holy Sonnets" (e.g., "Batter My Heart, Three-Personed God").

Metonymy and synecdoche are two closely related figures of speech that further illustrate the power of metaphorical language to convey meaning more intensely and vividly than is possible with prosaic statement. Metonymy (from the Greek, meaning "change of name") involves referring to an object or concept by substituting the name of another object or concept with which it is usually associated: for example, we might speak of "the Crown" when we mean the monarch, or describe the US executive branch as "the White House." When the writer uses only part of something to signify the whole, or an individual to represent a class, we have an instance of synecdoche: T.S. Eliot provides an example in "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" when a crab is described as "a pair of ragged claws." Similarly, synecdoche is present in Milton's contemptuous term "blind mouths" to describe the "corrupted clergy" he attacks in "Lycidas."

Dylan Thomas employs both metonymy and synecdoche in his poem "The Hand That Signed the Paper":

The hand that signed the paper felled a city;
Five sovereign fingers taxed the breath,
Doubled the globe of dead and halved a country;
These five kings did a king to death.

The mighty hand leads to a sloping shoulder,
The finger joints are cramped with chalk;
A goose's quill has put an end to murder
That put an end to talk.

The hand that signed the treaty bred a fever,
And famine grew, and locusts came;
Great is the hand that holds dominion over
Man by a scribbled name.

The five kings count the dead but do not soften
The crusted wound nor stroke the brow;
A hand rules pity as a hand rules heaven;
Hands have no tears to flow.

The "hand" of the poem is evidently a synecdoche for a great king who enters into treaties with friends and foes to wage wars, conquer kingdoms, and extend his personal power—all at the expense of his suffering subjects. The "goose quill" of the second stanza is a metonymy, standing for the pen used to sign the treaty or the death warrant that brings the war to an end.

Thomas's poem is an excellent example of the power of figurative language, which, by its vividness and concentrated force, can add layers of meaning to a poem, make abstract ideas concrete, and intensify the poem's emotional impact.

THE POEM AS PERFORMANCE: WRITER AND PERSON

Poetry is always dramatic. Sometimes the drama is explicit, as in Robert Browning's monologues, in which we hear the voice of a participant in a dialogue; in "My Last Duchess" we are present as the Duke reflects on the portrait of his late wife for the benefit of a visitor who has come to negotiate on behalf of the woman who is to become the Duke's next wife. Or we listen with amusement and pity as the dying Bishop addresses his venal and unsympathetic sons and tries to bargain with them for a fine burial ("The Bishop Orders His Tomb at St. Praxed's"). In such poems, the notion of a speaking voice is paramount: the speaker is a personage in a play, and the poem a means of conveying plot and character.

Sometimes the drama is less apparent, and takes the form of a plea, or a compliment, or an argument addressed to a silent listener. In Donne's "The Flea" we can infer from the poem the situation that has called it forth: a lover's advances are being rejected by his beloved, and his poem is an argument intended to overcome her reluctance by means of wit and logic. We can see a similar example in Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress": here the very shape of the poem, its three-paragraph structure, corresponds to the stages of the speaker's argument as he presents an apparently irrefutable line of reasoning. Much love poetry has this kind of background as its inspiration; the yearnings or lamentations of the lover are part of an imagined scene, not merely versified reflections about an abstraction called "love."

Meditative or reflective poetry can be dramatic too. Donne's "Holy Sonnets" are pleas from a tormented soul struggling to find its god; Tennyson's "In Memoriam" follows the agonized workings of a mind tracing a path from grief and anger to acceptance and renewed hope.

We should never assume that the speaker, the "I" of the poem, is simply a voice for the writer's own views. The speaker in W.H. Auden's "To an Unknown Citizen," presenting a summary of the dead citizen's life, appears to be an official spokesperson for the society which the citizen served ("Our report on his union"; "Our researchers ..." etc.). The speaker's words are laudatory, yet we perceive immediately that Auden's own views of this society are anything but approving. The speaker seems satisfied with the highly regimented nature of his society, one in which every aspect of the individual's life is under scrutiny and subject to correction. The only things necessary to the happiness of the "Modern Man," it seems, are "A phonograph, a radio, a car, and a frigidaire." The tone here is subtly ironic, an irony created by the gap between the imagined speaker's perception and the real feelings of the writer.

PERFORMANCE POETRY

Poetry began as an oral art, passed on in the form of chants, myths, ballads, and legends recited to an audience of listeners rather than readers. Even today, the dramatic qualities of a poem may extend beyond written text. "Performance poets" combine poetry and stagecraft in presenting their work to live audiences. Dramatic uses of voice, rhythm, body movement, music, and sometimes other visual effects make the "text" of the poem multi-dimensional. For example, Edith Sitwell's poem-sequence Façade (1922) was originally set to music: Sitwell read from behind a screen, while a live orchestra played. This performance was designed to enhance the verbal and rhythmic qualities of her poetry:

Beneath the flat and paper sky
 The sun, a demon's eye
 Glowed through the air, that mask of glass;
 All wand'ring sounds that pass

Seemed out of tune, as if the light
 Were fiddle-strings pulled tight.
 The market-square with spire and bell
 Clanged out the hour in Hell.

By performing their poetry, writers can also convey cultural values and traditions. The cultural aspect of performance is central to Black poetry, which originates in a highly oral tradition of folklore and storytelling. From its roots in Africa, this oral tradition has been manifested in the songs and stories of slaves, in spirituals, in the jazz rhythms of the Twenties and the Thirties and in the rebelliousness of reggae and of rap. Even when it remains "on the page," much Black poetry written in the oral tradition has a compelling rhythmic quality. The lines below from Linton Kwesi Johnson's "Mi Revalueshanary Fren," for example, blur the line between spoken poetry and song. Johnson often performs his "dub poetry" against reggae musical backings.

yes, people powa jus a showa evry howa an evrybody claim dem democratic but some a wolf an some a sheep an dat is problematic

The chorus of Johnson's poems, with its constant repetitions, digs deeply into the roots of African song and chant. Its performance qualities become clearer when the poem is read aloud:

Husak
 e ad to go
 Honnicka
 e ad to go
 Chowcheskhu
 e ad to go
 Just like apartied will av to go

To perform a poem is one way to see and hear poetry as multi-dimensional, cultural, historical, and often also political. Performance is also another way to discover how poetic "meaning" can be constructed in the dynamic relation between speaker and listener.

TONE: THE SPEAKER'S ATTITUDE

In understanding poetry, it is helpful to imagine a poem as having a "voice." The voice may be close to the poet's own, or that of an imagined character, a persona adopted by the poet. The tone of the voice will reveal the speaker's attitude to the subject, thus helping to shape our understanding and response. In speech we can indicate our feelings by raising or lowering our voices, and we can accompany words with physical actions. In writing, we must try to convey the tonal inflections of the speaking voice through devices of language and rhythm, through imagery and figures of speech, and through allusions and contrasts.

THE IRONIC TONE

Housman's poem "Terence, This Is Stupid Stuff" offers a useful example of ways in which manipulating tone can reinforce meaning. When Housman, presenting himself in the poem as "Terence," imagines himself to be criticized for writing gloomy poems, his response to his critics takes the form of an ironic alternative: perhaps they should stick to drinking ale:

Oh, many a peer of England brews
 Livelier liquor than the Muse,
 And malt does more than Milton can
 To justify God's ways to man.

The tone here is one of heavy scorn. The speaker is impatient with those who refuse to look at the realities of life and death, and who prefer to take refuge in simple-minded pleasure. The ludicrous comparisons, first between the brewers who have been made peers of England and the classical Muse of poetry, then between malt and Milton, create a sense of disproportion and ironic tension; the explicit allusion to Paradise Lost ("To justify God's ways to man") helps to drive home the poet's bitter recognition that his auditors are part of that fallen world depicted by Milton, yet unable or unwilling to acknowledge their harsh condition. The three couplets that follow offer a series of contrasts: in each case, the first line sets up a pleasant expectation and the second dashes it with a blunt reminder of reality:

Ale, man, ale's the stuff to drink
 For fellows whom it hurts to think:
 Look into the pewter pot
 To see the world as the world's not.
 And faith, 'tis pleasant till 'tis past:
 The mischief is that 'twill not last.

These are all jabs at the "sterling lads" who would prefer to lie in "lovely muck" and not think about the way the world is. Housman's sardonic advice is all the more pointed for its sharp and ironic tone.

POETIC FORMS

In poetry, language is intimately related to form, which is the structuring of words within identifiable patterns. In prose we speak of phrases, sentences, and paragraphs; in poetry, we identify structures by lines, stanzas, or complete forms such as the sonnet or the ode (though poetry in complete or blank verse has paragraphs of variable length, not formal stanzas: see below).

Rightly handled, the form enhances expression and meaning, just as a frame can define and enhance a painting or photograph. Unlike the photo frame, however, form in poetry is an integral part of the whole work. At one end of the scale, the term "form" may describe the epic, the lengthy narrative governed by such conventions as division into books, a lofty style, and the interplay between human and supernatural characters. At the other end lies the epigram, a witty and pointed saying whose distinguishing characteristic is its brevity, as in Alexander Pope's famous couplet,

I am his Highness' dog at Kew;
Pray tell me sir, whose dog are you?

Between the epic and the epigram lie many other poetic forms, such as the sonnet, the ballad, or the ode. "Form" may also describe stanzaic patterns like couplets and quatrains.

"FIXED FORM" POEMS

The best-known poetic form is probably the sonnet, the fourteen-line poem inherited from Italy (the word itself is from the Italian sonetto, little song or sound). Within those fourteen lines, whether the poet chooses the "Petrarchan" rhyme scheme or the "English" form (see below in the section on "Rhyme"), the challenge is to develop an idea or situation that must find its statement and its resolution within the strict confines of the sonnet frame. Typically, there is an initial idea, description, or statement of feeling, followed by a "turn" in the thought that takes the reader by surprise, or that casts the situation in an unexpected light. Thus in Sonnet 130, "My Mistress' Eyes Are Nothing Like the Sun," William Shakespeare spends the first three quatrains apparently disparaging his lover in a series of unfavorable comparisons—"If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun"—but in the closing couplet his point becomes clear:

And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
As any she belied with false compare.

In other words, the speaker's disparaging comparisons have really been parodies of sentimental clichés which falsify reality; his mistress has no need of the exaggerations or distortions of conventional love poetry.

Other foreign forms borrowed and adapted by English-language poets include the ghazal and the pantoum. The ghazal, strongly associated with classical Urdu literature, originated in Persia and Arabia and was brought to the Indian subcontinent in the twelfth century. It consists of a series of couplets held together by a refrain, a simple rhyme scheme (a/a, b/a, c/a, d/a...), and a common rhythm, but only loosely related in theme or subject. Some English-language practitioners of the form have captured the epigrammatic quality of the ghazal, but most do not adhere to the strict pattern of the classical form.

The pantoum, based on a Malaysian form, was imported into English poetry via the work of nineteenth-century French poets. Typically it presents a series of quatrains rhyming abab, linked by a pattern of repetition in which the second and fourth lines of a quatrain become the first and third lines of the stanza that follows. In the poem's final stanza, the pattern is reversed: the second line repeats the third line of the first stanza, and the last line repeats the poem's opening line, thus creating the effect of a loop.

Similar to the pantoum in the circularity of its structure is the villanelle, originally a French form, with five tercets and a concluding quatrain held together by only two rhymes (aba, aba, aba, aba, aba, abaa) and by a refrain that repeats the first line at lines 6, 12, and 18, while the third line of the first tercet reappears as lines 9, 15, and 19. With its interlocking rhymes and elaborate repetitions, the villanelle can create a variety of tonal effects, ranging from lighthearted parody to the sonorous and earnest exhortation of Dylan Thomas's "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night."

STANZAIC FORMS

Recurring formal groupings of lines within a poem are usually described as “stanzas.” Both the recurring and the formal aspects of stanzaic forms are important; it is a common misconception to think that any group of lines in a poem, if it is set off by line spaces, constitutes a stanza. If such a group of lines is not patterned as one of a recurring group sharing similar formal characteristics, however, then it may be more appropriate to refer to such irregular groupings in the way we do for prose—as paragraphs. A ballad is typically divided into stanzas; a prose poem or a poem written in free verse, on the other hand, will rarely be divided into stanzas.

A stanza may be identified by the number of lines and the patterns of rhyme repeated in each grouping. One of the simpler traditional forms is the ballad stanza, with its alternating four and three-foot lines and its abcb rhyme scheme. Drawing on this form’s association with medieval ballads and legends, Keats produces the eerie mystery of “La Belle Dame Sans Merci”:

I saw pale kings and princes too,
Pale warriors, death-pale were they all;
They cried—“La Belle Dame sans Merci
Hath thee in thrall!”

Such imitations are a form of literary allusion; Keats uses a traditional stanza form to remind us of poems like “Sir Patrick Spens” or “Barbara Allen” to dramatize the painful thralldom of love by placing it within a well-known tradition of ballad narratives with similar forms and themes.

The four-line stanza, or quatrain, may be used for a variety of effects: from the elegiac solemnity of Gray’s “Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard” to the apparent lightness and simplicity of some of Emily Dickinson’s poems. Tennyson used a rhyming quatrain to such good effect in In Memoriam that the form he employed (four lines of iambic tetrameter rhyming abba) is known as the “In Memoriam stanza.”

Other commonly used forms of stanza include the rhyming couplet, terza rima, ottava rima, rhyme royal, and the Spenserian stanza. Each of these is a rhetorical unit within a longer whole, rather like a paragraph within an essay. The poet’s choice among such forms is dictated, at least in part, by the effects that each may produce. Thus the rhyming couplet often expresses a complete statement within two lines, creating a sense of density of thought, of coherence and closure; it is particularly effective where the writer wishes to set up contrasts, or to achieve the witty compactness of epigram:

Of all mad creatures, if the learn’d are right,
It is the slaver kills, and not the bite.
A fool quite angry is quite innocent:
Alas! ’tis ten times worse when they repent.

(from Pope, “Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot”)

Ottava rima, as its Italian name implies, is an eight-line stanza, with the rhyme scheme abababcc. Like the sonnet, it is long enough to allow the development of a single thought in some detail and complexity, with a concluding couplet that may extend the central idea or cast it in a wholly unexpected light. W.B. Yeats uses this stanza form in “Sailing to Byzantium” and “Among Schoolchildren.” Though much used by Renaissance poets, it is particularly associated with George Gordon, Lord Byron’s Don Juan, in which the poet exploits to the full its potential for devastating irony and bathos. It is long enough to allow the development of a single thought in some detail and complexity; the concluding couplet can then, sonnet-like, turn that thought upon its head, or cast it in a wholly unexpected light:

Sagest of women, even of widows, she
 Resolved that Juan should be quite a paragon,
 And worthy of the noblest pedigree
 (His sire was of Castile, his dam from Aragon).
 Then for accomplishments of chivalry,
 In case our lord the king should go to war again,
 He learned the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
 And how to scale a fortress—or a nunnery.
 (Don Juan I.38)

FREE VERSE

Not all writers want the order and symmetry—some might say the restraints and limitations—of traditional forms, and many have turned to free verse as a means of liberating their thoughts and feelings. Deriving its name from the French “vers libre” made popular by the French Symbolistes at the end of the nineteenth century, free verse is characterized by irregularity of meter, line length, and rhyme. This does not mean that it is without pattern; rather, it tends to follow more closely than other forms the unforced rhythms and accents of natural speech, making calculated use of spacing, line breaks, and “cadences,” the rhythmic units that govern phrasing in speech.

Free verse is not a modern invention. Milton was an early practitioner, as was Blake; however, it was the great modern writers of free verse—first Walt Whitman, then Pound, Eliot, and William Carlos Williams (interestingly, all Americans, at least originally)—who gave this form a fluidity and flexibility that could free the imagination to deal with any kind of feeling or experience. Perhaps because it depends so much more than traditional forms upon the individual intuitions of the poet, it is the form of poetic structure most commonly found today. The best practitioners recognize that free verse, like any other kind of poetry, demands clarity, precision, and a close connection between technique and meaning.

PROSE POETRY

At the furthest extreme from traditional forms lies poetry written in prose. Contradictory as this label may seem, the two have much in common. Prose has at its disposal all the figurative devices available to poetry, such as metaphor, personification, or apostrophe; it may use structuring devices such as verbal repetition or parallel syntactical structures; it can draw on the same tonal range, from pathos to irony. The difference is that prose poetry accomplishes its ends in sentences and paragraphs, rather than lines or stanzas. First given prominence by the French poet Charles Baudelaire (Petits Poèmes en prose, 1862), the form is much used to present fragments of heightened sensation, conveyed through vivid or impressionistic description. It draws upon such prosaic forms as journal entries, lists, even footnotes. Prose poetry should be distinguished from “poetic prose,” which may be found in a variety of settings (from the King James Bible to the fiction of Jeanette Winterson); the distinction—which not all critics would accept—appears to lie in the writer’s intention.

Christan Bök’s Eunoia is an interesting example of the ways in which a writer of prose poetry may try to balance the demands of each medium. Eunoia is an avowedly experimental work in which each chapter is restricted to the use of a single vowel. The text is governed by a series of rules described by the author in an afterword; they include a requirement that all chapters “must allude to the art of writing. All sentences must accent internal rhyme through the use of syntactical parallelism. The text must exhaust the lexicon for each vowel, citing at least 98% of the available repertoire....” Having imposed such constraints upon the language and form of the work, Bök then sets himself the task of showing that “even under such improbable conditions of duress, language can still express an uncanny, if not sublime, thought.” The result is a surrealistic narrative that blends poetic and linguistic devices to almost hypnotic effect.

THE POEM AS A MATERIAL OBJECT

Both free verse and prose poetry pay attention in different ways to the poem as a living thing on the printed page. But the way in which poetry is presented in material form is an important part of the existence of almost any form of poetry. In the six volumes of this anthology the material form of the poem is highlighted by the inclusion of a number of facsimile reproductions of poems of other eras in their earliest extant material form.

RHYTHM AND SCANSION

When we read poetry, we often become aware of a pattern of rhythm within a line or set of lines. The formal analysis of that rhythmic pattern, or “meter,” is called scansion. The verb “to scan” may carry different meanings, depending upon the context: if the critic “scans” a line, he or she is attempting to determine the metrical pattern in which it is cast; if the line “scans,” we are making the observation that the line conforms to particular metrical rules. Whatever the context, the process of scansion is based on the premise that a line of verse is built on a pattern of stresses, a recurring set of more or less regular beats established by the alternation of light and heavy accents in syllables and words. The rhythmic pattern so distinguished in a given poem is said to be the “meter” of that poem. If we find it impossible to identify any specific metrical pattern, the poem is probably an example of free verse.

QUANTITATIVE, SYLLABIC, AND ACCENTUAL-SYLLABIC VERSE

Although we owe much of our terminology for analyzing or describing poetry to the Greeks and Romans, the foundation of our metrical system is quite different from theirs. They measured a line of verse by the duration of sound (“quantity”) in each syllable, and by the combination of short and long syllables. Such poetry is known as quantitative verse.

Unlike Greek or Latin, English is a heavily accented language. Thus poetry of the Anglo-Saxon period, such as Beowulf, was accentual: that is, the lines were based on a fixed number of accents, or stresses, regardless of the number of syllables in the line:

Oft Scyld Scefing sceapena þreatum monegum maegþum meodosetla ofteah.

Few modern poets have written in the accentual tradition. A notable exception was Gerard Manley Hopkins, who based his line on a pattern of strong stresses that he called “sprung rhythm.” Hopkins experimented with rhythms and stresses that approximate the accentual quality of natural speech; the result is a line that is emphatic, abrupt, even harsh in its forcefulness:

I caught this morning morning's minion, kingdom of daylight's dauphin, dapple-dawn-drawn
Falcon, in his riding
Of the rolling level underneath him steady air

(from “The Windhover”)

Under the influence of French poetry, following the Norman invasion of the eleventh century, English writers were introduced to syllabic prosody: that is, poetry in which the number of syllables is the determining factor in the length of any line, regardless of the number of stresses or their placement. A few modern writers have successfully produced syllabic poetry.

However, the accentual patterns of English, in speech as well as in poetry, were too strongly ingrained to disappear. Instead, the native accentual practice combined with the imported syllabic conventions to produce the accentual-syllabic line, in which the writer works with combinations of stressed and unstressed syllables in lines of equal syllabic length. Geoffrey Chaucer was the first great writer to employ the accentual-syllabic line in English poetry:

x / / x x / x / x / x
 Ther was also a Nonne, a Prioeresse,
 x / x / x x / x x /
 That of hir smiling was ful simple and coy.
 x / x / x / x / x /
 Hir gretteste ooth was but by saintè Loy,
 x / x / x / x / x /
 And she was clepèd Madame Eglantine.
 (from The Canterbury Tales)

The fundamental pattern here is the ten-syllable line (although the convention of sounding the final “e” at the end of a line in Middle English verse sometimes produces eleven syllables). Each line contains five stressed syllables, each of which alternates with one or two unstressed syllables. This was to become the predominant meter of poetry in English until the general adoption of free verse in the twentieth century.

IDENTIFYING POETIC METER

Conventionally, meter is established by dividing a line into roughly equal parts, based on the rise and fall of the rhythmic beats. Each of these divisions, conventionally marked by a bar, is known as a “foot,” and within the foot there will be a combination of stressed and unstressed syllables, indicated by the prosodic symbols / (stressed) and x (unstressed).

x / x / x / x /
 I know | that I | shall meet | my fate
 / x x / x / x /
 Somewhere | among | the clouds | above ...
 (from Yeats, “An Irish Airman Foresees His Death”)

To describe the meter used in a poem, we must first determine what kind of foot predominates, and then count the number of feet in each line. To describe the resultant meter we use terminology borrowed from classical prosody. In identifying the meter of English verse we commonly apply the following labels:

iambic (x /): a foot with one weak stress followed by one strong stress

x / x / x / x / x /
 (“Look home | ward, Ang | el, now, | and melt | with ruth”) trochaic (/ x): strong followed by weak

/ x / x / x /
 (“Ty-ger! | Ty-ger! | burning | bright”) anapaestic (x x /): two weak stresses, followed by a strong

x x / x x / x x /
("I have passed | with a nod | of the head") dactylic (/ x x): strong stress followed by two weak

/ x x / x x /
("Hickory | dickory | dock")

spondaic (/ /): two strong stresses

/ / / x / x / x
("If hate | killed men, | Brother | Lawrence,
God's blood, | would not | mine kill | you?")

We also use classical terms to describe the number of feet in a line. Thus, a line with one foot is monometer; with two feet, dimeter; three feet, trimeter; four feet, tetrameter; five feet, pentameter; and six feet, hexameter.

Scansion of the two lines from Yeats's "Irish Airman" quoted above shows that the predominant foot is iambic (x /), that there are four feet to each line, and that the poem is therefore written in iambic tetrameters. The first foot of the second line, however, may be read as a trochee ("Somewhere"); the variation upon the iambic norm here is an example of substitution, a means whereby the writer may avoid the monotony that would result from adhering too closely to a set rhythm. We very quickly build up an expectation about the dominant meter of a poem; the poet will sometimes disturb that expectation by changing the beat, and so through substitution create a pleasurable tension in our awareness.

The prevailing meter in English poetry is iambic, since the natural rhythm of spoken English is predominantly iambic. Nonetheless, poets may employ other rhythms where it suits their purpose. Thus W.H. Auden can create a solemn tone by the use of a trochaic meter (/ x):

/ x / x / x /
Earth, receive an honoured guest;
/ x / x / x /
William Yeats is laid to rest:
/ x / x / x /
Let the Irish vessel lie
/ x / x / x x
Emptied of its poetry.

The same meter may be much less funereal, as in Ben Jonson's song "To Celia":

/ x / x / x /
Come, my Celia, let us prove,
/ x / x / x /
While we may, the sports of love.
/ x / x / x / x
Time will not be ours forever;
/ x / x / x / x
He, at length, our good will sever.

The sense of greater pace in this last example derives in part from the more staccato phrasing, and also from the greater use of monosyllabic words. A more obviously lilting, dancing effect is obtained from anapaestic rhythm (x x /):

x / x x / x x / x x /
 I sprang to the stirrup, and Joris, and he;
 x / x x / x x / x x /
 I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three.
 / / x x / x x / x x /
 "Good speed!" cried the watch, as the gatebolts undrew;
 / / x x / x x / x x /
 "Speed!" echoed the wall to us galloping through.
 (from Browning, "How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix")

Coleridge wittily captured the varying effects of different meters in "Metrical Feet: Lesson for a Boy," which the poet wrote for his sons, and in which he marked the stresses himself:

/ x / x / x /
 Trochee trips from long to short;
 x / x / x / x /
 From long to long in solemn sort
 / / x / / / x / / x
 Slow Spondee stalks; strong foot! yet ill able / x x / x x / x x / x x
 Ever to come up with Dactyl trisyllable.
 x / x / x / x /
 Iambics march from short to long:—
 x x / x x / x x / x x /
 With a leap and a bound the swift Anapaests throng...

A meter which often deals with serious themes is unrhymed iambic pentameter, also known as blank verse. This is the meter of Shakespeare's plays, notably his great tragedies; it is the meter, too, of Milton's Paradise Lost, to which it lends a desired sonority and magnificence; and of Wordsworth's "Lines Composed a Few Miles above Tintern Abbey," where the flexibility of the meter allows the writer to move by turns from description, to narration, to philosophical reflection.

RHYME, CONSONANCE, ASSONANCE, AND ALLITERATION

Perhaps the most obvious sign of poetic form is rhyme: that is, the repetition of syllables with the same or similar sounds. If the rhyme words are placed at the end of the line, they are known as end-rhymes. The opening stanza of Housman's "To an Athlete Dying Young" has two pairs of end-rhymes:

The time you won your town the race
 We chaired you through the market-place,
 Man and boy stood cheering by,
 And home we brought you shoulder-high.

Words rhyming within a line are internal rhymes, as in the first and third lines of this stanza from Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner":

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew
 The furrow followed free;
 We were the first that ever burst
 Into that silent sea.

When, as is usually the case, the rhyme occurs in a stressed syllable, it is known as a masculine rhyme; if the rhyming word ends in an unstressed syllable, it is referred to as feminine. The difference is apparent in the opening stanzas of Alfred Tennyson's poem "The Lady of Shalott," where the first stanza establishes the basic iambic meter with strong stresses on the rhyming words:

On either side the river lie
 Long fields of barley and of rye,
 That clothe the wold and meet the sky;
 And through the field the road runs by
 To many-towered Camelot ...

In the second stanza Tennyson changes to trochaic lines, ending in unstressed syllables and feminine rhymes:

Willows whiten, aspens quiver,
 Little breezes dusk and shiver
 Through the wave that runs forever
 By the island in the river
 Flowing down to Camelot.

Not only does Tennyson avoid monotony here by his shift to feminine rhymes, he also darkens the mood by using words that imply a contrast with the bright warmth of day—"quiver," "dusk," "shiver"—in preparation for the introduction of the "silent isle" that embowers the Lady.

NEAR RHYMES

Most of the rhymes in "The Lady of Shalott" are exact, or "perfect" rhymes. However, in the second of the stanzas just quoted, it is evident that "forever" at the end of the third line is not a "perfect" rhyme; rather, it is an instance of "near" or "slant" rhyme. Such "imperfect" rhymes are quite deliberate; indeed, two stanzas later we find the rhyming sequence "early," "barley," "cheerly," and "clearly," followed by the rhymes "weary," "airy," and "fairy." As with the introduction of feminine rhymes, such divergences from one dominant pattern prevent monotony and avoid a too-mechanical sing-song effect.

More importantly, near-rhymes have an oddly unsettling effect, perhaps because they both raise and frustrate our expectation of a perfect rhyme. Their use certainly gives added emphasis to the words at the end of these chilling lines from Wilfred Owen's "Strange Meeting":

For by my glee might many men have laughed,
 And of my weeping something had been left,
 Which must die now. I mean the truth untold,
 The pity of war, the pity war distilled.
 Now men will go content with what we spoiled,
 Or, discontent, boil bloody, and be spilled.

CONSONANCE AND ASSONANCE

In Owen's poem, the near-rhymes "laughed / left" and "spoiled / spilled" are good examples of consonance, which pairs words with similar consonants but different intervening vowels. Other examples from Owen's poem include "groined / groaned," "hall / Hell," "years / yours," and "mystery / mastery."

Related to consonance as a linking device is assonance, the echoing of similar vowel sounds in the stressed syllables of words with differing consonants (lane/hail, penitent/reticence). A device favored particularly by descriptive poets, it appears often in the work of the English Romantics, especially Shelley and Keats, and their great Victorian successor Tennyson, all of whom had a good ear for the musical quality of language. In the following passage, Tennyson makes effective use of repeated "o" and "ow" sounds to suggest the soft moaning of the wind as it spreads the seed of the lotos plant:

The Lotos blooms below the barren peak,
The Lotos blows by every winding creek;
All day the wind breathes low with mellower tone;
Through every hollow cave and alley lone
Round and round the spicy downs the yellow Lotos dust is blown.

(from "The Lotos-Eaters")

ALLITERATION

Alliteration connects words which have the same initial consonant. Like consonance and rhyme, alliteration adds emphasis, throwing individual words into strong relief, and lending force to rhythm. This is especially evident in the work of Gerard Manley Hopkins, where alliteration works in conjunction with the heavy stresses of sprung rhythm:

Brute beauty and valour and act, oh, air, pride, plume, here
Buckle! AND the fire that breaks from thee then, a billion
Times told lovelier, more dangerous, O my chevalier!

(from "The Windhover")

Like assonance, alliteration is useful in descriptive poetry, reinforcing an impression or mood through repeated sounds:

Thou on whose stream, 'mid the steep sky's commotion,
Loose clouds like Earth's decaying leaves are shed,
Shook from the tangled boughs of Heaven and Ocean

(from Percy Shelley, "Ode to the West Wind")

The repetition of "s" and "sh" sounds conveys the rushing sound of a wind that drives everything before it. This effect is also an example of onomatopoeia, a figure of speech in which the sound of the words seems to echo the sense.

RHYME AND POETIC STRUCTURE

Rhyme may play a central role in the structure of a poem. This is particularly apparent in the sonnet form, where the expression of the thought is heavily influenced by the poet's choice of rhyme-scheme. The "English" or "Shakespearean" sonnet has three quatrains rhyming abab, cdcd, efef, and concludes with a rhyming couplet, gg. This pattern lends itself well to the statement and restatement of an idea, as we find, for example, in Shakespeare's sonnet "That time of year thou mayst in me behold." Each of the quatrains presents an image of decline or decay—a tree in winter, the coming of night, a dying fire; the closing couplet then relates these images to the thought of an impending separation and attendant feelings of loss.

The organization of the "Italian" or "Petrarchan" sonnet, by contrast, hinges on a rhyme scheme that creates two parts, an eight-line section (the octave) typically rhyming abbaabba, and a concluding six-line section (the sestet) rhyming cdecde or some other variation. In the octave, the writer describes a thought or feeling; in the sestet, the writer may elaborate upon that thought, or may introduce a sudden "turn" or change of direction. A good example of the Italian form is Donne's "Batter My Heart, Three-Personed God."

The rhyming pattern established at the beginning of a poem is usually followed throughout; thus the opening sets up an expectation in the reader, which the poet may sometimes play on by means of an unexpected or surprising rhyme. This is especially evident in comic verse, where peculiar or unexpected rhymes can contribute a great deal to the comic effect:

I shoot the Hippopotamus with bullets made of platinum,
Because if I use leaden ones
his hide is sure to flatten 'em.

(Hilaire Belloc, "The Hippopotamus")

Finally, one of the most obvious yet important aspects of rhyme is its sound. It acts as a kind of musical punctuation, lending verse an added resonance and beauty. And as anyone who has ever had to learn poetry by heart will testify, the sound of rhyme is a powerful aid to memorization and recall, from helping a child to learn numbers—

One, two,
Buckle my shoe,
Three, four,
Knock at the door—

—to selling toothpaste through an advertising jingle in which the use of rhyme drives home the identity of a product:

You'll wonder where the yellow went,
When you brush your teeth with Pepsodent.

OTHER FORMS WITH INTERLOCKING RHYMES

Other forms besides the sonnet depend upon rhyme for their structural integrity. These include the rondeau, a poem of thirteen lines in three stanzas, with two half lines acting as a refrain, and having only two rhymes. The linking effect of rhyme is also essential to the three-line stanza called terza rima, the form chosen by Shelley for his “Ode to the West Wind,” where the rhyme scheme (aba, bcb, cdc, etc.) gives a strong sense of forward movement. But a poet need not be limited to particular forms to use interlocking rhyme schemes.

THE POET’S TASK

The poet’s task, in Sir Philip Sidney’s view, is to move us to virtue and well-doing by coming to us with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well-enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner; and pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue: even as the child is often brought to take most wholesome things by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste.

(The Defence of Poesy, 1593)

Modern poets have been less preoccupied with the didactic or moral force of poetry, its capacity to win the mind to virtue; nonetheless, like their Renaissance counterparts, they view poetry as a means to understanding, a point of light in an otherwise dark universe. To Robert Frost, a poem “begins in delight and ends in wisdom”:

It begins in delight, it inclines to the impulse, it assumes direction with the first line laid down, it runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion.
(“The Figure a Poem Makes,” Collected Poems, 1939)

Rhyme and meter are important tools at the poet’s disposal, and can be valuable aids in developing thought as well as in creating rhythmic or musical effects. However, the technical skills needed to turn a good line or create metrical complexities should not be confused with the ability to write good poetry. Sidney wryly observes in his Defence of Poesy that “there have been many excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets. ... [I]t is not rhyming and versing that maketh a poet, no more than a long gown maketh an advocate.” Technical virtuosity may arouse our admiration, but something else is needed to bring that “constriction of the throat and ... precipitation of water to the eyes” that A.E. Housman speaks about. What that “something” is will always elude definition, and is perhaps best left for readers and listeners to determine for themselves through their own encounters with poetry.

COUNTIES OF THE
BRITISH ISLES

MONARCHS AND PRIME MINISTERS

MONARCHS

HOUSE OF WESSEX

Egbert (Ecgeberht)	829–39
Æthelwulf	839–58
Æthelbald	858–60
Æthelbert	860–66
Æthelred I	866–71
Alfred the Great	871–99
Edward the Elder	899–924
Athelstan	924–40
Edmund I	940–46
Edred (Eadred)	946–55
Edwy (Eadwig)	955–59
Edgar	959–75
Edward the Martyr	975–78
Æthelred II (the Unready)	978–1016
Edmund II (Ironside)	1016

DANISH LINE

Canute (Cnut)	1016–35
Harold I (Harefoot)	1035–40
Hardecanute	1040–42

WESSEX LINE, RESTORED

Edward the Confessor	1042–66
Harold II	1066

NORMAN LINE

William I (the Conqueror)	1066–87
William II (Rufus)	1087–1100
Henry I (Beauclerc)	1100–35
Stephen	1135–54

Harold II

William I

MONARCHS

PLANTAGENET,
ANGEVIN LINE

Henry II	1154–89
Richard I (Coeur de Lion)	1189–99
John (Lackland)	1199–1216
Henry III	1216–72
Edward I (Longshanks)	1272–1307
Edward II	1307–27
Edward III	1327–77
Richard II	1377–99

PLANTAGENET,
LANCASTRIAN LINE

Henry IV	1399–1413
Henry V	1413–22
Henry VI	1422–61

PLANTAGENET,
YORKIST LINE

Edward IV	1461–83
Edward V	1483
Richard III	1483–85

HOUSE OF TUDOR

Henry VII	1485–1509
Henry VIII	1509–47
Edward VI	1547–53
Mary I	1553–58
Elizabeth I	1558–1603

HOUSE OF STUART

James I	1603–25
Charles I	1625–49

(THE COMMONWEALTH)	1649–60
Oliver Cromwell	1649–58
Richard Cromwell	1658–59

Henry VIII

Mary I

MONARCHS

HOUSE OF STUART, RESTORED

Charles II	1660–85
James II	1685–88

HOUSE OF ORANGE AND STUART

William III and Mary II	1689–94
William III	1694–1702

HOUSE OF STUART

Anne	1702–14
------	---------

HOUSE OF BRUNSWICK, HANOVER LINE

George I	1714–27
George II	1727–60
George III	1760–1820

George, Prince of Wales,
Prince Regent

George III

PRIME MINISTERS

Sir Robert Walpole (Whig)	1721–42
Earl of Wilmington (Whig)	1742–43
Henry Pelham (Whig)	1743–54
Duke of Newcastle (Whig)	1754–56
Duke of Devonshire (Whig)	1756–57
Duke of Newcastle (Whig)	1757–62
Earl of Bute (Tory)	1762–63
George Grenville (Whig)	1763–65
Marquess of Rockingham (Whig)	1765–66
William Pitt the Elder (Earl of Chatham) (Whig)	1766–68
Duke of Grafton (Whig)	1768–70
Frederick North (Lord North) (Tory)	1770–82
Marquess of Rockingham (Whig)	1782
Earl of Shelburne (Whig)	1782–83
Duke of Portland	1783
William Pitt the Younger (Tory)	1783–1801
Henry Addington (Tory)	1801–04
William Pitt the Younger (Tory)	1804–06
William Wyndham Grenville (Baron Grenville) (Whig)	1806–07

MONARCHS

George, Prince of Wales, Prince Regent	1811–20
George IV	1820–30
William IV	1830–37
Victoria	1837–1901

Victoria

HOUSE OF SAXE- COBURG-GOTHA
Edward VII	1901–10
HOUSE OF WINDSOR
George V	1910–36

PRIME MINISTERS

Duke of Portland (Whig)	1807–09
Spencer Perceval (Tory)	1809–12
Earl of Liverpool (Tory)	1812–27
George Canning (Tory)	1827
Viscount Goderich (Tory)	1827–28
Duke of Wellington (Tory)	1828–30
Earl Grey (Whig)	1830–34
Viscount Melbourne (Whig)	1834
Sir Robert Peel (Tory)	1834–35
Viscount Melbourne (Whig)	1835–41
Sir Robert Peel (Tory)	1841–46
Lord John Russell (later Earl) (Liberal)	1846–52
Earl of Derby (Con.)	1852
Earl of Aberdeen (Tory)	1852–55
Viscount Palmerston (Lib.)	1855–58
Earl of Derby (Con.)	1858–59
Viscount Palmerston (Lib.)	1859–65
Earl Russell (Liberal)	1865–66
Earl of Derby (Con.)	1866–68
Benjamin Disraeli (Con.)	1868
William Gladstone (Lib.)	1868–74
Benjamin Disraeli (Con.)	1874–80
William Gladstone (Lib.)	1880–85
Marquess of Salisbury (Con.)	1885–86
William Gladstone (Lib.)	1886
Marquess of Salisbury (Con.)	1886–92
William Gladstone (Lib.)	1892–94
Earl of Rosebery (Lib.)	1894–95
Marquess of Salisbury (Con.)	1895–1902
Arthur Balfour (Con.)	1902–05
Sir Henry Campbell- Bannerman (Lib.)	1905–08
Herbert Asquith (Lib.)	1908–15
Herbert Asquith (Lib.)	1915–16

MONARCHS

Edward VIII	1936
George VI	1936–52
Elizabeth II	1952–

PRIME MINISTERS

David Lloyd George	1916–22
Andrew Bonar Law (Con.)	1922–23
Stanley Baldwin (Con.)	1923–24
James Ramsay MacDonald (Labour)	1924
Stanley Baldwin (Con.)	1924–29
James Ramsay MacDonald (Labour)	1929–31
James Ramsay MacDonald (Labour)	1931–35
Stanley Baldwin (Con.)	1935–37
Neville Chamberlain (Con.)	1937–40
Winston Churchill (Con.)	1940–45
Winston Churchill (Con.)	1945
Clement Attlee (Labour)	1945–51
Sir Winston Churchill (Con.)	1951–55

Winston Churchill

Sir Anthony Eden (Con.)	1955–57
Harold Macmillan (Con.)	1957–63
Sir Alex Douglas-Home (Con.)	1963–64
Harold Wilson (Labour)	1964–70
Edward Heath (Con.)	1970–74
Harold Wilson (Labour)	1974–76
James Callaghan (Labour)	1976–79
Margaret Thatcher (Con.)	1979–90
John Major (Con.)	1990–97
Tony Blair (Labour)	1997–2007
Gordon Brown (Labour)	2007–10
David Cameron (Con.)	2010–16
Theresa May (Con.)	2016–

GLOSSARY OF TERMS

Accent: the natural emphasis (stress) speakers place on a syllable.

Accentual Verse: poetry in which a line is measured only by the number of accents or stresses, not by the number of syllables.

Accentual-Syllabic Verse: the most common metrical system in traditional English verse, in which a line is measured by the number of syllables and by the pattern of accented (stressed) and unaccented (unstressed) syllables.

Aesthetes: members of a late nineteenth-century movement that valued “art for art’s sake”—for its purely aesthetic qualities, as opposed to valuing art for the moral content it may convey, for the intellectual stimulation it may provide, or for a range of other qualities.

Alexandrine: a line of verse that is 12 syllables long. In English verse, the alexandrine is always an iambic hexameter: that is, it has six iambic feet. The most-often quoted example is the second line in a couplet from Alexander Pope’s “Essay on Criticism” (1711): “A needless Alexandrine ends the song / That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.” See also Spenserian stanza.

Allegory: a narrative with both a literal meaning and secondary, often symbolic meaning or meanings. Allegory frequently employs personification to give concrete embodiment to abstract concepts or entities, such as feelings or personal qualities. It may also present one set of characters or events in the guise of another, using implied parallels for the purposes of satire or political comment, as in John Dryden’s poem “Absalom and Achitophel.”

Alliteration: the grouping of words with the same initial consonant (e.g., “break, blow, burn, and make me new”). The repetition of sound acts as a connector. See also assonance and consonance.

Alliterative Verse: poetry that employs alliteration of stressed syllables in each line as its chief structural principle.

Allusion: a reference, often indirect or unidentified, to a person, thing, or event. A reference in one literary work to another literary work, whether to its content or its form, also constitutes an allusion.

Ambiguity: an “opening” of language created by the writer to allow for multiple meanings or differing interpretations. In literature, ambiguity may be deliberately employed by the writer to enrich meaning; this differs from any unintentional, unwanted, ambiguity in non-literary prose.

Amphibrach: a metrical foot with three syllables, the second of which is stressed: x / x (e.g., sensation).

Analogy: a broad term that refers to our processes of noting similarities among things or events. Specific forms of analogy in poetry include simile and metaphor (see below).

Anapaest: a metrical foot containing two unstressed syllables followed by one stressed syllable: xx / (e.g., underneath, intervene).

Anglican Church / Church of England: formed after Henry VIII's break with Rome in the 1530s, the Church of England had acquired a permanently Protestant cast by the 1570s. There has remained considerable variation within the Church, however, with distinctions often drawn among High Church, Broad Church, and Latitudinarian. At one extreme High Church Anglicans (some of whom prefer to be known as "Anglo-Catholics") prefer relatively elaborate church rituals not dissimilar in form to those of the Roman Catholic Church and place considerable emphasis on church hierarchy, while in the other direction Latitudinarians prefer relatively informal religious services and tend far more towards egalitarianism.

Antistrophe: from Greek drama, the chorus's countermovement or reply to an initial movement (strophe). See ode below.

Apostrophe: a figure of speech (a trope; see figures of speech below) in which a writer directly addresses an object—or a dead or absent person—as if the imagined audience were actually listening.

Archetype: in literature and mythology, a recurring idea, symbol, motif, character, or place. To some scholars and psychologists, an archetype represents universal human thought-patterns or experiences.

Assonance: the repetition of identical or similar vowel sounds in stressed syllables in which the surrounding consonants are different: for example, "shame" and "fate"; "gale" and "cage"; or the long "i" sounds in "Beside the pumice isle..."

Aubade: a lyric poem that greets or laments the arrival of dawn.

Ballad: a folk song, or a poem originally recited to an audience, which tells a dramatic story based on legend or history.

Ballad Stanza: a quatrain with alternating four-stress and three-stress lines, rhyming abcb. A variant is "common measure," in which the alternating lines are strictly iambic, and rhyme abab.

Ballade: a fixed form most commonly characterized by only three rhymes, with an 8-line stanza rhyming ababbcbc and an envoy rhyming bcbc. Both Chaucer and Dante Gabriel Rossetti ("Ballad of the Dead Ladies") adopted this form.

Baroque: powerful and heavily ornamented in style. "Baroque" is a term from the history of visual art and of music that is sometimes also used to describe certain literary styles, such as that of Richard Crashaw.

Bathos: an anticlimactic effect brought about by a writer's descent from an elevated subject or tone to the ordinary or trivial.

Benedictine Rule: set of instructions for monastic communities, composed by Saint Benedict of Nursia (died c. 457).

Blank Verse: unrhymed lines written in iambic pentameter, a form introduced to English verse by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of parts of Virgil's Aeneid in 1547.

Bombast: inappropriately inflated or grandiose language.

Broadside: individual sheet of paper printed on only one side. From the sixteenth through to the eighteenth centuries broadsides of a variety of different sorts (e.g., ballads, political tracts, short satires) were sold on the streets.

Broken Rhyme: in which a multi-syllable word is split at the end of a line and continued onto the next, to allow an end-rhyme with the split syllable.

Burlesque: satire of a particularly exaggerated sort, particularly that which ridicules its subject by emphasizing its vulgar or ridiculous aspects.

Caesura: a pause or break in a line of verse occurring where a phrase, clause, or sentence ends, and indicated in scansion by the mark ||. If it occurs in the middle of the line, it is known as a "medial" caesura.

Canon: in literature, those works that are commonly accepted as possessing authority or importance. In practice, "canonical" texts or authors are those that are discussed most frequently by scholars and taught most frequently in university courses.

Canto: a sub-section of a long (usually epic) poem.

Canzone: a short song or poem, with stanzas of equal length and an envoy.

Carpe Diem: Latin (from Horace) meaning "seize the day." The idea of enjoying the moment is a common one in Renaissance love poetry. See, for example, Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress."

Catalexis: the omission of unstressed syllables from a line of verse (such a line is referred to as "catalectic"). In iambic verse it is usually the first syllable of the line that is omitted; in trochaic, the last. For example, in the first stanza of Housman's "To an Athlete Dying Young" the third line is catalectic: i.e., it has dropped the first, unstressed syllable called for by the poem's iambic tetrameter form: "The time you won your town the race / We chaired you through the market-place; / Man and boy stood cheering by, / And home we brought you shoulder-high."

Catharsis: the arousal through the performance of a dramatic tragedy of "emotions of pity and fear" to a point where "purgation" or "purification" occurs and the feelings are released or transformed. The concept was developed by Aristotle in his Poetics from an ancient Greek medical concept, and adapted by him into an aesthetic principle.

Chiasmus: a figure of speech (a scheme) that reverses word order in successive parallel clauses. If the word order is A-B-C in the first clause, it becomes C-B-A in the second: for example, Donne's line "She is all states, and all princes, I" ("The Sun Rising") incorporates this reversal (though with an ellipsis).

Classical: originating in or relating to ancient Greek or Roman culture. As commonly conceived, classical implies a strong sense of formal order. The term neoclassical is often used with reference to literature of the Restoration and eighteenth century that was strongly influenced by ancient Greek and Roman models.

Closet Drama: a play (typically in verse) written for private performance. The term came into use in the first half of the nineteenth century.

Colored Narrative: alternative term for free indirect discourse.

Comedy: as a literary term, used originally to denote that class of ancient Greek drama in which the action ends happily. More broadly the term has been used to describe a wide variety of literary forms of a more or less light-hearted character.

Commedia dell'arte: largely improvised comic performances conducted by masked performers and involving considerable physical activity. The genre of commedia dell'arte originated in Italy in the sixteenth century; it was influential throughout Europe for more than two centuries thereafter.

Commonwealth: from the fifteenth century, a term roughly equivalent to the modern "state," but tending to emphasize the commonality of interests among all citizens. In the seventeenth century Britain was named a commonwealth under Oliver Cromwell. In the twentieth century, the term came to be applied to associations of many nations; the British Commonwealth became the successor to the British Empire.

Conceit: an unusually elaborate metaphor or simile that extends beyond its original tenor and vehicle, sometimes becoming a "master" analogy for the entire poem (see, for example, Donne's "The Flea," and Robert Frost's sonnet "She is as in a field a silken tent"). Ingenious or fanciful images and comparisons were especially popular with the metaphysical poets of the seventeenth century, giving rise to the term "metaphysical conceit."

Concrete Poetry: an experimental form, most popular during the 1950s and 60s, in which the printed type itself forms a visual image of the poem's key words or ideas. See also pattern poetry, assonance.

Connotation: the implied, often unspoken meaning(s) of a given word, as distinct from its denotation, or literal meaning. Connotations may have highly emotional undertones and are usually culturally specific.

Conservative Party: See Political Parties.

Consonance: the pairing of words with similar initial and ending consonants, but with different vowel sounds (live/love, wander/wonder). See also alliteration.

Convention: aesthetic approach, technique, or practice accepted as characteristic and appropriate for a particular form. It is a convention of certain sorts of plays, for example, that the characters speak in blank verse, of other sorts of plays that characters speak in rhymed couplets, and of still other sorts of dramatic performances that characters frequently break into song to express their feelings.

Couplet: a pair of rhyming lines, usually in the same meter. If they form a complete unit of thought and are grammatically complete, the lines are known as a closed couplet. See also heroic couplet below.

Dactyl: a metrical foot containing one strong stress followed by two weak stresses: / xx (e.g., muttering, helplessly). A minor form known as “double dactyls” makes use of this meter for humorous purposes, e.g., “Jiggery pokery” or “Higgledy piggledy.”

Denotation: See connotation above.

Devolution: process through which a degree of political power was transferred in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries from the British government to assemblies in Scotland and in Wales.

Dialogue: words spoken by characters to one another. (When a character is addressing him or her self or the audience directly, the words spoken are referred to as a monologue.)

Diction: word choice. Whether the diction of a literary work (or of a literary character) is colloquial, conversational, formal, or of some other type contributes significantly to the tone of the text as well as to characterization.

Didacticism: aesthetic approach emphasizing moral instruction.

Dimeter: a poetic line containing two metrical feet.

Dirge: a song or poem that mourns someone’s death. See also elegy and lament below.

Disestablishmentarianism: movement opposing an official state-supported religion, in particular the Church of England in that role.

Dissonance: harsh, unmusical sounds or rhythms which poets may use deliberately to achieve certain effects.

Dramatic Irony: this form of irony occurs when the audience’s reception of a speech by a character on the stage is affected by the possession by the audience of information not available to the character.

Dramatic Monologue: a lyric poem that takes the form of an utterance by a single person addressing a silent listener. The speaker may be an historical personage (as in some of Robert Browning’s dramatic monologues), a figure drawn from myth or legend (as in some of Tennyson’s), or an entirely imagined figure, as in Webster’s “A Castaway.”

Dub Poetry: a form of protest poetry originating in Jamaica, with its roots in dance rhythms, especially reggae, and often accompanied in performance by drums and music. See also rap.

Duple Foot: a duple foot of poetry has two syllables. The possible duple forms are iamb (in which the stress is on the second of the two syllables), trochee (in which the stress is on the first of the two syllables), spondee (in which both are stressed equally), and pyrrhic (in which both syllables are unstressed).

Eclogue: now generally used simply as an alternative name for a pastoral poem. In classical times and in the early modern period, however, an eclogue (or idyll) was a specific type of pastoral poem—a dialogue or dramatic monologue involving rustic characters. (The other main sub-genre of the pastoral was the georgic.)

Elegiac Stanza: a quatrain of iambic pentameters rhyming abab, often used in poems meditating on death or sorrow. The best-known example is Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard."

Elegy: a poem which formally mourns the death of a particular person (e.g., Tennyson's "In Memoriam") or in which the poet meditates on other serious subjects (e.g., Gray's "Elegy"). See also dirge.

Elision: omitting or suppressing a letter or an unstressed syllable at the beginning or end of a word, so that a line of verse may conform to a given metrical scheme. For example, the three syllables at the beginning of Shakespeare's sonnet 129 are reduced to two by the omission of the first vowel: "Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame." See also syncope.

Ellipsis: the omission of a word or words necessary for the complete grammatical construction of a sentence, but not necessary for our understanding of the sentence.

End-rhyme: See rhyme.

End-stopped: a line of poetry is said to be end-stopped when the end of the line coincides with a natural pause in the syntax, such as the conclusion of a sentence; e.g., in this couplet from Pope's "Essay on Criticism," both lines are end-stopped: "A little learning is a dangerous thing; / Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring." Compare this with enjambement.

Enjambement: the "running-on" of the sense from one line of poetry to the next, with no pause created by punctuation or syntax. (The more commonly found alternative is referred to as an end-stopped line.)

Envoy (Envoi): a stanza or half-stanza that forms the conclusion of certain French poetic forms, such as the sestina or the ballade. It often sums up or comments upon what has gone before.

Epic: a lengthy narrative poem, often divided into books and sub-divided into cantos. It generally celebrates heroic deeds or events, and the style tends to be lofty and grand. Examples in English include Spenser's The Faerie Queene and Milton's Paradise Lost.

Epic Simile: an elaborate simile, developed at such length that the vehicle of the comparison momentarily displaces the primary subject with which it is being compared.

Epigram: a very short poem, sometimes in closed couplet form, characterized by pointed wit.

Epigraph: a quotation placed at the beginning of a discourse to indicate or foreshadow the theme.

Epiphany: a moment at which matters of significance are suddenly illuminated for a literary character (or for the reader), typically triggered by something small and seemingly of little import. The term first came into wide currency in connection with the fiction of James Joyce.

Episodic Plot: plot comprising a variety of episodes that are only loosely connected by threads of story material (as opposed to plots that present one or more continually unfolding narratives where successive episodes build one on another).

Epithalamion: a poem celebrating a wedding. The best-known example in English is probably Edmund Spenser's "Epithalamion" (1595).

Eulogy: text expressing praise, especially for a distinguished person recently deceased.

Euphemism: mode of expression through which aspects of reality considered to be vulgar, crudely physical, or unpleasant are referred to indirectly rather than named explicitly. A variety of euphemisms exist for the processes of urination and defecation; passed away is often used as a euphemism for died. (The word euphemism has the same root as Euphuism (see below), but has taken on a different meaning.)

Euphony: pleasant, musical sounds or rhythms—the opposite of dissonance.

Euphuism: in the late sixteenth century John Lyly published a prose romance, Euphues, which employed a style that featured long sentences filled with balanced phrases and clauses, many of them adding little to the content. This highly mannered style was popular in the court of Elizabeth I for a few years following the publication of Lyly's famous work, and the style became known as Euphuism.

European Union: (EU) group of nations formed in 1993 as the successor to the European Economic Community (Common Market). Britain first applied for membership in the latter in 1961; at first its efforts to join were blocked by the French government, but in 1973 Prime Minister Edward Heath successfully negotiated Britain's entry into the group. Britain resisted some moves towards full integration with the European community, in particular retaining its own currency when other European nations adopted the Euro on 1 January 2002. In 2016, the United Kingdom held a referendum and voted to leave the European Union altogether.

Exchequer: In earlier eras, the central royal financial office, responsible for receiving and keeping track of crown revenues. In later eras, part of the bureaucracy equivalent to the Ministry of Finance in Canada or the Treasury in the United States (the modern post of Chancellor of the Exchequer is equivalent to the American post of Secretary of the Treasury, the Canadian post of Minister of Finance, or the Australian post of Treasurer).

Exposition: the setting out of material in an ordered form, either in speech or in writing. In a play those parts of the action that do not occur on stage but are rather recounted by the characters are frequently described as being presented in exposition. Similarly, when the background narrative is filled in near the beginning of a novel, such material is often described as having been presented in exposition. Somewhat confusingly, however, the term "expository prose" is usually used with reference not to fiction but to the setting forth of arguments or descriptions in the context of essays or other works of prose non-fiction.

Eye-rhyme: See rhyme below.

Feminine Ending: the ending of a line of poetry on an “extra,” and, especially, on an unstressed syllable. See, for example, the first line of Keat’s “Ode on a Grecian Urn”: “A thing of beauty is a joy forever,” a line of iambic pentameter in which the final foot is an amphibrach rather than an iamb.

Feminine Rhyme: See rhyme below.

Figures of Speech: deliberate, highly concentrated uses of language to achieve particular purposes or effects on an audience. There are two kinds of figures: schemes and tropes. Schemes involve changes in word-sound and word-order, such as alliteration and chiasmus. Tropes play on our understandings of words to extend, alter, or transform meaning, as in metaphor and personification.

First-Person Narrative: narrative recounted using I and me. See also narrative perspective.

Fixed Forms: the term applied to a number of poetic forms and stanzaic patterns, many derived from French models, such as ballade, rondeau, sestina, triolet, and villanelle. Other “fixed forms” include the sonnet, rhyme royal, haiku, and ottava rima.

Folio: largest of several sizes of book page commonly used in the first few centuries after the introduction of the printing press. A folio size results from very large paper being folded in half. Paper size during this period was not standardized; though a typical folio page was about 15 inches high, some could be more than twice that height. When the same sheet is folded twice a quarto is produced, and when it is folded 3 times an octavo.

Foot: a unit of a line of verse which contains a particular combination of stressed and unstressed syllables. Dividing a line into metrical feet (*iamb*s, trochees, etc.), then counting the number of feet per line, is part of scansion. See also meter.

Franklin: in the late medieval period, a landholder of free status, but ranking below the gentry.

Free Indirect Discourse: in prose fiction, commentary in which a seemingly objective and omniscient narrative voice assumes the point of view of one or more characters. When we hear through the third person narrative voice of Jane Austen’s Pride and Prejudice, for example, that Mr. Darcy “was the proudest, most disagreeable man in the world, and every body hoped that he would never come there again,” the narrative voice has assumed the point of view of “every body” in the community; we as readers are not meant to take it that Mr. Darcy is indeed the most disagreeable man in the world. Similarly, in the following passage from the same novel, we are likely to take it as being the view of the character Charlotte that marriage is “the only honourable provision for well-educated young women of small fortune,” not to take it to be an objective statement of perceived truth on the part of the novel’s third person narrative voice:

[Charlotte’s] reflections were in general satisfactory. Mr. Collins to be sure was neither sensible nor agreeable; his society was irksome, and his attachment to her must be imaginary. But still he would be her husband. Without thinking highly either of men or of matrimony, marriage had always been her object; it was the only honourable provision for well-educated young women of small fortune, and however uncertain of giving happiness, must be their pleasantest preservative from want.

The term free indirect discourse may also be applied to situations in which it may not be entirely clear if the thoughts expressed emanate from the character, the narrator, or some combination of the two. (In the above-quoted passage expressing Charlotte's thoughts, indeed, some might argue that the statement concerning marriage should be taken as the expression of a belief that the narrative voice shares, at least in part.)

Free Verse: poetry that does not follow any regular meter, line length, or rhyming scheme. In many respects, though, free verse follows the complex natural "rules" and rhythmic patterns (or cadences) of speech.

Gaelic: Celtic language, variants of which are spoken in Ireland and Scotland.

Genre: a particular literary form. The concept of genre may be used with different levels of generality. At the most general, poetry, drama, and prose fiction are distinguished as separate genres. At a lower level of generality various sub-genres are frequently distinguished, such as (within drama) comedy and tragedy, or, at a still lower level of generality, Elizabethan domestic tragedy, Edwardian drawing-room comedy, and so on.

Georgic: (from Virgil's Georgics) a poem that celebrates the natural wealth of the countryside and advises how to cultivate and live in harmony with it. Pope's Windsor Forest and James Thomson's Seasons are classed as georgics. They were often said to make up, with eclogues, the two alliterative forms of pastoral poetry.

Ghazal: derived from Persian and Indian precedents, the ghazal presents a series of thoughts in closed couplets joined by a simple rhyme-scheme: aa ba ca da, etc.

Gothic: in architecture and the visual arts, a term used to describe styles prevalent from the twelfth to the fourteenth centuries, but in literature a term used to describe work with a sinister or grotesque tone that seeks to evoke a sense of terror on the part of the reader or audience. Gothic literature originated as a genre in the eighteenth century with works such as Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto. To some extent the notion of the medieval itself then carried with it associations of the dark and the grotesque, but from the beginning an element of intentional exaggeration (sometimes verging on self-parody) attached itself to the genre. The Gothic trend of youth culture that began in the late twentieth century is less clearly associated with the medieval, but shares with the various varieties of Gothic literature (from Walpole in the eighteenth century, to Bram Stoker in the early twentieth, to Stephen King and Anne Rice in the late twentieth) a fondness for the sensational and the grotesque, as well as a propensity to self-parody.

Guilds: non-clerical associations that arose in the late Anglo-Saxon period, devoted both to social purposes (such as the organization of feasts for the members) and to piety. In the later medieval period guilds developed strong associations with particular occupations.

Haiku: a Japanese form, using three unrhymed lines of five, seven, and five syllables. Conventionally, it uses precise, concentrated images to suggest states of feeling.

Heptameter: a line containing seven metrical feet.

Heroic Couplet: a pair of rhymed iambic pentameters, so called because the form was much used in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century poems and plays on heroic subjects.

Hexameter: a line containing six metrical feet.

Home Rule: movement dedicated to making Ireland politically independent from Britain.

Horatian Ode: inspired by the work of the Roman poet Horace, an ode that is usually calm and meditative in tone, and homostrophic (i.e., having regular stanzas) in form. Keats's odes are English examples.

House of Commons: elected legislative body, in Britain currently consisting of six hundred and fifty members of Parliament. See also Parliament.

House of Lords: the "Upper House" of the British Houses of Parliament. Since the nineteenth century the House of Lords has been far less powerful than the elected House of Commons. The House of Lords is currently made up of both hereditary peers (Lords whose title is passed on from generation to generation) and life peers. As a result of legislation enacted by the Labour government of Tony Blair, the role of hereditary peers in Parliament is being phased out.

Humors: the four humors were believed in until the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to be elements in the makeup of all humans; a person's temperament was thought to be determined by the way in which the humors were combined. When the choleric humor was dominant, the person would tend towards anger; when the sanguine humor was dominant, towards pleasant affability; when the phlegmatic humor was dominant, towards a cool and calm attitude and/or a lack of feeling or enthusiasm; and when the melancholic humor was dominant, towards withdrawal and melancholy.

Hymn: a song whose theme is usually religious, in praise of divinity. Literary hymns may praise more secular subjects.

Hyperbole: a figure of speech (a trope) that deliberately exaggerates or inflates meaning to achieve particular effects, such as the irony in A.E. Housman's claim (from "Terence, This Is Stupid Stuff") that "malt does more than Milton can / To justify God's ways to man."

Iamb: the most common metrical foot in English verse, containing one unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable: x / (e.g., between, achieve).

Idyll: traditionally, a short pastoral poem that idealizes country life, conveying impressions of innocence and happiness.

Image: the recreation in words of objects perceived by the senses, sometimes thought of as "pictures," although other senses besides sight are involved. Besides this literal application, the term also refers more generally to the descriptive effects of figurative language, especially in metaphor and simile.

Imagism: a poetic movement that was popular mainly in the second decade of the twentieth century. The goal of Imagist poets (such as H.D. and Ezra Pound in their early work) was to represent emotions or impressions through highly concentrated imagery.

Incantation: a chant or recitation of words that are believed to have magical power. A poem can achieve an “incantatory” effect through a compelling rhyme scheme and other repetitive patterns.

In Memoriam Stanza: a four-line stanza in iambic tetrameter, rhyming abba: the type of stanza used by Tennyson in In Memoriam.

Interlocking Rhyme: See rhyme.

Internal Rhyme: See rhyme.

Irony: a subtle form of humor in which a statement is understood to convey a quite different (and often entirely opposite) meaning. A writer achieves this by carefully making sure that the statement occurs in a context which undermines or twists the statement’s “literal” meaning. Hyperbole and litotes are often used for ironic effect. Sarcasm is a particularly strong or crude form of irony (usually spoken), in which the meaning is conveyed largely by the tone of voice adopted; something said sarcastically is meant clearly to imply its opposite.

Labour Party: See Political Parties.

Lament: a poem which expresses profound regret or grief either because of a death, or because of the loss of a former, happier state.

Language Poetry: a movement that defies the usual lyric and narrative conventions of poetry, and that challenges the structures and codes of everyday language. Often seen as both politically and aesthetically subversive, its roots lie in the works of modernist writers like Ezra Pound and Gertrude Stein.

Liberal Party: See Political Parties.

Litotes: a figure of speech (a trope) in which a writer deliberately uses understatement to highlight the importance of an argument, or to convey an ironic attitude.

Liturgical Drama: drama based on and/or incorporating text from the liturgy—the text recited during religious services.

Lollard: member of the group of radical Christians that took its inspiration from the ideas of John Wyclif (c. 1330–84). The Lollards, in many ways precursors of the Protestant Reformation, advocated making the Bible available to all, and dedication to the principles of evangelical poverty in imitation of Christ.

Luddites: protestors against the mechanization of industry on the grounds that it was leading to the loss of employment and to an increase in poverty. In the years 1811 to 1816 there were several Luddite protests in which machines were destroyed.

Lyric: a poem, usually short, expressing an individual speaker’s feelings or private thoughts. Originally a song performed with accompaniment on a lyre, the lyric poem is often noted for musicality of rhyme and rhythm. The lyric genre includes a variety of forms, including the sonnet, the ode, the elegy, the madrigal, the aubade, the dramatic monologue, and the hymn.

Madrigal: a lyric poem, usually short and focusing on pastoral or romantic themes. A madrigal is often set to music.

Masculine Ending: a metrical line ending on a stressed syllable. Masculine Rhyme: see rhyme.

Masque: an entertainment typically combining music and dance, with a limited script, extravagant costumes and sets, and often incorporating spectacular special effects. Masques, which were performed before court audiences in the early seventeenth century, often focused on royal themes and frequently drew on classical mythology.

Mass: within Christianity, a church service that includes the sacrament of the Eucharist (Holy Communion), in which bread and wine are consumed which are believed by those of many Christian denominations to have been transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ. Anglicans (Episcopalians) are more likely to believe the bread and wine merely symbolizes the body and blood.

Melodrama: originally a term used to describe nineteenth-century plays featuring sensational story lines and a crude separation of characters into moral categories, with the pure and virtuous pitted against evil villains. Early melodramas employed background music throughout the action of the play as a means of heightening the emotional response of the audience. By extension, certain sorts of prose fictions or poems are often described as having melodramatic elements.

Metaphor: a figure of speech (in this case, a trope) in which a comparison is made or identity is asserted between two unrelated things or actions without the use of “like” or “as.” The primary subject is known as the tenor; to illuminate its nature, the writer links it to wholly different images, ideas, or actions referred to as the vehicle. Unlike a simile, which is a direct comparison of two things, a metaphor “fuses” the separate qualities of two things, creating a new idea. For example, Shakespeare’s “Let slip the dogs of war” is a metaphorical statement. The tenor, or primary subject, is “war”; the vehicle of the metaphor is the image of hunting dogs released from their leash. The line fuses the idea of war with the qualities of ravaging bloodlust associated with hunting dogs.

Metaphysical Poets: a group of seventeenth-century English poets, notably Donne, Cowley, Marvell, and Herbert, who employed unusual difficult imagery and conceits (see above) in order to develop intellectual and religious themes. The term was first applied to these writers to mark as far-fetched their use of philosophical and scientific ideas in a poetic context.

Meter: the pattern of stresses, syllables, and pauses that constitutes the regular rhythm of a line of verse. The meter of a poem written in the English accentual-syllabic tradition is determined by identifying the stressed and unstressed syllables in a line of verse, and grouping them into recurring units known as feet. See accent, accentual-syllabic, caesura, elision, and scansion. For some of the better known meters, see iamb, trochee, dactyl, anapaest, and spondee. See also monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter.

Methodist: Protestant denomination formed in the eighteenth century as part of the religious movement led by John and Charles Wesley. Originally a movement within the Church of England, Methodism entailed enthusiastic evangelism, a strong emphasis on free will, and a strict regimen of Christian living.

Metonymy: a figure of speech (a trope), meaning “change of name,” in which a writer refers to an object or idea by substituting the name of another object or idea closely associated with it: for example, the substitution of “crown” for monarchy, “the press” for journalism, or “the pen” for writing. Synecdoche (see below) is a kind of metonymy.

Mock-heroic: a style applying the elevated diction and vocabulary of epic poetry to low or ridiculous subjects. An example is Alexander Pope’s “The Rape of the Lock.”

Monologue: words spoken by a character to him or herself or to an audience directly.

Monometer: a line containing one metrical foot.

Mood: this can describe the writer’s attitude, implied or expressed, towards the subject (see tone below); or it may refer to the atmosphere that a writer creates in a passage of description or narration.

Motif: an idea, image, action, or plot element that recurs throughout a literary work, creating new levels of meaning and strengthening structural coherence. The term is taken from music, where it describes recurring melodies or themes. See also theme.

Narrative Perspective: in fiction, the point of view from which the story is narrated. A first-person narrative is recounted using I and me, whereas a third person narrative is recounted using he, she, they, and so on. When a narrative is written in the third person and the narrative voice evidently “knows” all that is being done and thought, the story is typically described as being recounted by an “omniscient narrator.”

Neoclassical: adapted from or substantially influenced by the cultures of ancient Greece and Rome. The term neoclassical is often used to describe the ideals of Restoration and eighteenth-century writers and artists who looked to ancient Greek and Roman civilization for models.

Nobility: privileged class, the members of which are distinguished by the holding of titles. Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Viscounts, and Barons (in that order of precedence) are all holders of hereditary titles—that is to say, in the British patrilineal tradition, titles passed on from generation to generation to the eldest son. The title of Baronet, also hereditary, was added to this list by James I. Holders of non-hereditary titles include Knights and Dames.

Nonconformist: general term used to describe one who does not subscribe to the Church of England.

Nonsense Verse: light, humorous poetry which contradicts logic, plays with the absurd, and invents words for amusing effects. Lewis Carroll is one of the best-known practitioners of nonsense verse.

Octave: also known as “octet,” the first eight lines in an Italian/Petrarchan sonnet, rhyming abbaabba. See also sestet and sonnet.

Octosyllabic: a line of poetry with eight syllables, as in iambic tetrameter.

Ode: originally a classical poetic form, used by the Greeks and Romans to convey serious themes. English poetry has evolved three main forms of ode: the Pindaric (imitative of the [continued ...]

odes of the Greek poet Pindar); the Horatian (modeled on the work of the Roman writer Horace); and the irregular ode. The Pindaric ode was an irregular stanza in English, has a tripartite structure of strophe, antistrophe, and epode (meaning turn, counterturn, and stand), modeled on the songs and movements of the Chorus in Greek drama. The Horatian ode is more personal, reflective, and literary, and employs a pattern of repeated stanzas. The irregular ode, as its name implies, avoids a recurrent stanza pattern, and is sometimes irregular in line length also (see, for example, Wordsworth's "Ode: Intimations of Immortality").

Onomatopoeia: a figure of speech (a scheme) in which a word "imitates" a sound, or in which the sound of a word seems to reflect its meaning.

Ottava Rima: an eight-line stanza, usually in iambic pentameter, with the rhyme scheme abababcc. For an example, see Byron's Don Juan, or Yeats's "Sailing to Byzantium."

Oxymoron: a figure of speech (a trope) in which two words whose meanings seem contradictory are placed together, a paradox: for example, the phrase "darkness visible," from Milton's Paradise Lost.

Paeon: a triumphant, celebratory song, often associated with a military victory.

Pale: in the medieval period, term for a protective zone around a fortress. As of the year 1500 three of these had been set up to guard frontiers of territory controlled by England—surrounding Calais in France, Berwick-upon-Tweed on the Scottish frontier, and Dublin in Ireland. The Dublin Pale was the largest of the three, and the term remained in use for a longer period there.

Pantoum: a poem in linked quatrains that rhyme abab. The second and fourth lines of one stanza are repeated as the first and third lines of the stanza that follows. In the final stanza the pattern is reversed: the second line repeats the third line of the first stanza, the fourth and final line repeats the first line of the first stanza.

Parliament: in Britain, the legislative body, comprising both the House of Commons and the House of Lords. Since the eighteenth century, the most powerful figure in the British government has been the Prime Minister rather than the monarch, the House of Commons has been the dominant body in Parliament, and members of the House of Commons have been organized in political parties. Since the mid-nineteenth century the effective executive in the British Parliamentary system has been the Cabinet, each member of which is typically in charge of a department of government. Unlike the American system, the British Parliamentary system (sometimes called the "Westminster system," after the location of the Houses of Parliament) brings together the executive and legislative functions of government, with the Prime Minister leading the government party in the House of Commons as well as directing the cabinet. By convention it is understood that the House of Lords will not contravene the wishes of the House of Commons in any fundamental way, though the "Upper House," as it is often referred to, may sometimes modify or reject legislation.

Parody: a close, usually mocking imitation of a particular literary work, or of the well-known style of a particular author, in order to expose or magnify weaknesses. Parody is a form of satire—that is, humor that may ridicule and scorn its object.

Pastiche: a discourse which borrows or imitates other writers' characters, forms, style, or ideas. Unlike a parody, a pastiche is usually intended as a compliment to the original writer.

Pastoral: in general, pertaining to country life; in prose, drama, and poetry, a stylized type of writing that idealizes the lives and innocence of country people, particularly shepherds and shepherdesses. Also see eclogue, georgic, idyll, above.

Pastoral Elegy: a poem in which the poet uses the pastoral style to lament the death of a friend, usually represented as a shepherd. Milton's "Lycidas" provides a good example of the form, including its use of such conventions as an invocation of the muse and a procession of mourners.

Pathetic Fallacy: a form of personification in which inanimate objects are given human emotions: for example, rain clouds "weeping." The word "fallacy" in this connection is intended to suggest the distortion of reality or the false emotion that may result from an exaggerated use of personification.

Pathos: the emotional quality of a discourse; or the ability of a discourse to appeal to our emotions. It is usually applied to the mood conveyed by images of pain, suffering, or loss that arouse feelings of pity or sorrow in the reader.

Pattern Poetry: a predecessor of modern concrete poetry, in which the shape of the poem on the page is intended to suggest or imitate an aspect of the poem's subject. George Herbert's "Easter Wings" is an example of pattern poetry.

Penny Dreadful: Victorian term for a cheap and poorly produced work of short fiction, usually of a sensational nature.

Pentameter: a line of verse containing five metrical feet.

Performance Poetry: poetry composed primarily for oral performance, often very theatrical in nature. See also dub poetry and rap.

Persona: the assumed identity or "speaking voice" that a writer projects in a discourse. The term "persona" literally means "mask." Even when a writer speaks in the first person, we should be aware that the attitudes or opinions we hear may not necessarily be those of the writer in real life.

Personification: a figure of speech (a trope), also known as "prosopopoeia," in which a writer refers to inanimate objects, ideas, or animals as if they were human, or creates a human figure to represent an abstract entity such as Philosophy or Peace.

Petrarchan Sonnet: the earliest form of the sonnet, also known as the Italian sonnet, with an 8-line octave and a six-line sestet. The Petrarchan sonnet traditionally focuses on love and descriptions of physical beauty.

Phoneme: a linguistic term denoting the smallest unit of sound that it is possible to distinguish. The words fun and phone each have three phonemes, though one has three letters and one has five. (Each makes up a single syllable.)

Pindaric: See ode.

Plot: the organization of story materials within a literary work. The order in which story material is presented (especially causes and consequences); the inclusion of elements that allow or encourage the reader or audience to form expectations as to what is likely to happen; the decision to present some story material through exposition rather than in more extended form as part of the main action of the narrative—all these are matters of plotting.

Political Parties: the party names “Whig” and “Tory” began to be used in the late seventeenth century; before that time members of the House of Commons acted individually or through shifting and very informal factions. At first the Whigs and Tories had little formal organization either, but by the mid-eighteenth century parties had acknowledged leaders, and the leader of the party with the largest number of members in the House of Commons had begun to be recognized as the Prime Minister. The Tories evolved into the modern Conservative Party, and the Whigs into the Liberal Party. In the late nineteenth century the Labour Party was formed in an effort to provide better representation in Parliament for the working class, and since the 1920s Labour and the Conservatives have alternated as the party of government, with the Liberals reduced to third-party status. (Since 1988, when the Liberals merged with a breakaway faction from Labour known as the Social Democrats, this third party has been named the Liberal Democrats.)

Pre-Raphaelites: originally a group of Victorian artists and writers, formed in 1848. Their goal was to revive what they considered the simpler, fresher, more natural art that existed before Raphael (1483–1520). The poet Dante Gabriel Rossetti was one of the founders of the group.

Presbyterian: term applied to a group of Protestants (primarily English and Scottish) who advocated replacing the traditional hierarchical church in which bishops and archbishops governed lower level members of the clergy with a system in which all presbyters (or ministers) would be equal. The Presbyterians, originally led by John Knox, were strongly influenced by the ideas of John Calvin.

Prose Poem: a poetic discourse that uses prose formats (e.g., it may use margins and paragraphs rather than line breaks or stanzas) yet is written with the kind of attention to language, rhythm, and cadence that characterizes verse.

Prosody: the study and analysis of meter, rhythm, rhyme, stanzaic pattern, and other devices of versification.

Protagonist: the central character in a literary work.

Prothalamion: a wedding song; a term coined by the poet Edmund Spenser, adapted from “epithalamion” (see above).

Public School: See schools below.

Pun: a play on words, in which a word with two or more distinct meanings, or two words with similar sounds, may create humorous ambiguities. Also known as paranomasia.

Puritan: term, originally applied only in a derogatory fashion but later widely accepted as descriptive, referring to those in England who favored religious reforms that went beyond those instituted as part of the Protestant Reformation, or, more generally, who were more forceful and uncompromising in pressing for religious purity both within the Church and in society as a whole.

Pyrrhic: a metrical foot containing two weak stresses: xx.

Quadrivium: group of four academic subjects (arithmetic, astronomy, geometry, and music) that made up part of the university coursework in the Middle Ages. They were studied after the more basic subjects of the Trivium.

Quantitative Meter: a metrical system used by Greek and Roman poets, in which a line of verse was measured by the “quantity,” or length of sound of each syllable. A foot was measured in terms of syllables classed as long or short.

Quantity: duration of syllables in poetry. The line “There is a Garden in her face” (the first line from the poem of the same name by Thomas Campion) is characterized by the short quantities of the syllables. The last line of Thomas Hardy’s “During Wind and Rain” has the same number of syllables as the line by Campion, but the quantities of the syllables are much longer—in other words, the line takes much longer to say: “Down their carved names the rain drop ploughs.”

Quatrain: a four-line stanza, usually rhymed.

Quintet: a five-line stanza. Sometimes given as quintain.

Rap: originally coined to describe informal conversation, “rap” now usually describes a style of performance poetry in which a poet will chant rhymed verse, sometimes improvised and usually with musical accompaniment that has a heavy beat.

Realism: as a literary term, the presentation through literature of material closely resembling real life. As notions both of what constitutes “real life” and of how it may be most faithfully represented in literature have varied widely, “realism” has taken a variety of meanings. The term naturalistic has sometimes been used as a synonym for realistic; naturalism originated in the nineteenth century as a term denoting a form of realism focusing in particular on grim, unpleasant, or ugly aspects of the real.

Refrain: one or more words or lines repeated at regular points throughout a poem, often at the end of each stanza or group of stanzas. Sometimes a whole stanza may be repeated to create a refrain, like the chorus in a song.

Reggae: a style of heavily rhythmic music from the West Indies with lyrics that are colloquial in language and often anti-establishment in content and flavor. First popularized in the 1960s and 1970s, reggae has had a lasting influence on performance poetry, rap, and dub.

Rhetoric: in classical Greece and Rome, the art of persuasion and public speaking. From the Middle Ages onwards, the study of rhetoric gave greater attention to style, particularly figures of speech. Today in poetics, the term rhetoric may encompass not only figures of speech, but also the persuasive effects of forms, sounds, and word choices.

Rhyme: the repetition of identical or similar sounds, usually in pairs and generally at the ends of metrical lines.

End-rhyme: a rhyming word or syllable at the end of a line.

Eye Rhyme: rhyming that pairs words whose spellings are alike but whose pronunciations are different: for example, though/slough.

Feminine Rhyme: a two-syllable (also known as “double”) rhyme. The first syllable is stressed and the second unstressed: for example, hasty/tasty. See also triple rhyme below.

Interlocking Rhyme: the repetition of rhymes from one stanza to the next, creating links that add to the poem’s continuity and coherence. Examples may be found in Shelley’s use of terza rima in “Ode to the West Wind” and in Dylan Thomas’s villanelle “Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night.”

Internal Rhyme: the placement of rhyming words within lines so that at least two words in a line rhyme with each other.

Masculine Rhyme: a correspondence of sound between the final stressed syllables at the end of two or more lines, as in grieve / leave, arr-i’ve / sur-vive.

Slant Rhyme: an imperfect or partial rhyme (also known as “near” or “half” rhyme) in which the final consonants of stressed syllables match but the vowel sounds do not. E.g., spoiled / spilled, taint / stint.

Triple Rhyme: a three-syllable rhyme in which the first syllable of each rhyme-word is stressed and the other two unstressed (e.g., lottery / coterie).

True Rhyme: a rhyme in which everything but the initial consonant matches perfectly in sound and spelling.

Rhyme Royal: a stanza of seven iambic pentameters, with a rhyme-scheme of ababbcc. This is also known as the Chaucerian stanza, as Chaucer was the first English poet to use this form. See also septet.

Rhythm: in speech, the arrangement of stressed and unstressed syllables creates units of sound. In song or verse, these units usually form a regular rhythmic pattern, a kind of beat, described in prosody as meter.

Romanticism: a major social and cultural movement, originating in Europe, that shaped much of Western artistic thought in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Opposing the ideal of controlled, rational order of the Enlightenment, Romanticism emphasizes the importance of spontaneous self-expression, emotion, and personal experience in producing art. In Romanticism, the “natural” is privileged over the conventional or the artificial.

Rondeau: a fifteen-line poem, generally octosyllabic, with only two rhymes throughout its three stanzas, and an unrhymed refrain at the end of the ninth and fifteenth lines, repeating part of the opening line.

Sarcasm: See irony.

Satire: literary work designed to make fun of or seriously criticize its subject. According to many literary theories of the Renaissance and neoclassical periods, the ridicule through satire of a certain sort of behavior may function for the reader or audience as a corrective of such behavior.

Scansion: the formal analysis of patterns of rhythm and rhyme in poetry. Each line of verse will have a certain number of fairly regular “beats” consisting of alternating stressed and unstressed syllables. To “scan” a poem is to count the beats in each line, to mark stressed and unstressed syllables and indicate their combination into “feet,” to note pauses, and to identify rhyme schemes with letters of the alphabet.

Scheme: See figures of speech.

Schools: in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the different forms of school in England included Cathedral schools (often founded with a view to the education of members of the choir); grammar schools (often founded by towns or by guilds, and teaching a much broader curriculum than the modern sense of “grammar” might suggest; private schools, operated by private individuals out of private residences; and public schools, which (like the private schools and the grammar schools) operated independent of any church authority, but unlike the grammar schools and private schools were organized as independent charities, and often offered free education. Over the centuries certain of these public schools, while remaining not-for-profit institutions, began to accept fee-paying students and to adopt standards that made them more and more exclusive. In the eighteenth and nineteenth century attendance at such prestigious public boarding schools as Eton, Westminster, and Winchester had become almost exclusively the preserve of the upper classes; by the nineteenth century such “public” schools were the equivalent of private schools in North America. A few girls attended some early grammar schools, but the greater part of this educational system was for boys only. Though a number of individuals of earlier periods were concerned to increase the number of private schools for girls, the movement to create a parallel girls’ system of public schools and grammar schools dates from the later nineteenth century.

Septet: a stanza containing seven lines.

Serf: in the medieval period, a person of unfree status, typically engaged in working the land.

Sestet: a six-line stanza that forms the second grouping of lines in an Italian / Petrarchan sonnet, following the octave. See sonnet and sestina.

Sestina: an elaborate unrhymed poem with six six-line stanzas and a three-line envoy.

Shire: originally a multiple estate; since the late medieval period a larger territory forming an administrative unit—also referred to as a county.

Simile: a figure of speech (a trope) which makes an explicit comparison between a particular object and another object or idea that is similar in some (often unexpected) way. A simile always uses “like” or “as” to signal the connection. Compare with metaphor above.

Sonnet: a highly structured lyric poem, which normally has fourteen lines of iambic pentameter. We can distinguish four major variations of the sonnet.

Italian/Petrarchan: named for the fourteenth-century Italian poet Petrarch, has an octave rhyming abbaabba, and a sestet rhyming cdecde, or cdcdcd (other arrangements are possible here). Usually, a turn in argument takes place between octave and sestet.

Miltonic: developed by Milton and similar to the Petrarchan in rhyme scheme, but eliminating the turn after the octave, thus giving greater unity to the poem's structure of thought.

Shakespearean: often called the English sonnet, this form has three quatrains and a couplet. The quatrains rhyme internally but do not interlock: abab cdcd efef gg. The turn may occur after the second quatrain, but is usually revealed in the final couplet. Shakespeare's sonnets are the best-known examples of this form.

Spenserian: after Edmund Spenser, who developed the form in his sonnet cycle Amoretti. This sonnet form has three quatrains linked through interlocking rhyme, and a separately rhyming couplet: abab bcbc cdcd ee.

Speaker: in the late medieval period, a member of the Commons in Parliament who spoke on behalf of that entire group. (The Commons first elected a Speaker in 1376.) In later eras the role of Speaker became one of chairing debates in the House of Commons and arbitrating disputes over matters of procedure.

Spenserian Stanza: a nine-line stanza, with eight iambic pentameters and a concluding alexandrine, rhyming ababbcc.

Spondee: a metrical foot containing two strong stressed syllables: // (e.g., blind mouths).

Sprung Rhythm: a modern variation of accentual verse, created by the English poet Gerard Manley Hopkins, in which rhythms are determined largely by the number of strong stresses in a line, without regard to the number of unstressed syllables. Hopkins felt that sprung rhythm more closely approximated the natural rhythms of speech than did conventional poetry.

Stanza: any lines of verse that are grouped together in a poem and separated from other similarly structured groups by a space. In metrical poetry, stanzas share metrical and rhyming patterns; however, stanzas may also be formed on the basis of thought, as in irregular odes. Conventional stanza forms include the tercet, the quatrain, rhyme royal, the Spenserian stanza, the ballad stanza, and ottava rima.

Stream of Consciousness: narrative technique that attempts to convey in prose fiction a sense of the progression of the full range of thoughts and sensations occurring within a character's mind. Twentieth-century pioneers in the use of the stream of consciousness technique include Dorothy Richardson, Virginia Woolf, and James Joyce.

Stress: See accent.

Strophe: the first stanza in a Pindaric ode. This is followed by an antistrophe (see above), which presents the same metrical pattern and rhyme scheme, and finally by an epode, differing in meter from the preceding stanzas. Upon completion of this "triad," the entire sequence can recur. Strophe may also describe a stanza or other subdivision in other kinds of poem.

Sublime: a concept, most popular in eighteenth-century England, of the qualities of grandeur, power, and awe that may be inherent in or produced by undomesticated nature or great art. The sublime was thought of as higher and loftier than something that is merely beautiful.

Subplot: a line of story that is subordinate to the main storyline of a narrative. (Note that properly speaking a subplot is a category of story material, not of plot.)

Substitution: a deliberate change from the dominant pattern of stresses in a line of verse to create emphasis or variation. Thus the first line of Shakespeare's sonnet "'Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?'" is decidedly iambic in meter (x / x / x / x / x /), whereas the second line substitutes a trochee (/ x) in the opening foot: "Thou art more lovely and more temperate."

Subtext: implied or suggested meaning of a passage of text, or of an entire work.

Syllabic Verse: poetry in which the length of a line is measured solely by the number of syllables, regardless of accents or patterns of stress.

Syllable: vocal sound or group of sounds forming a unit of speech; a syllable may be formed with a single effort of articulation. Some syllables consist of a single phoneme (e.g., the word I, or the first syllable in the word u-ni-ty) but others may be made up of several phonemes (as with one-syllable words such as lengths, splurged, and through). By contrast, the much shorter words ago, any, and open each have two syllables.

Symbol: a word, image, or idea that represents something more, or other, than for what it at first appears to stand. Like metaphor, the symbol extends meaning; but while the tenor and vehicle of metaphor are bound in a specific relationship, a symbol may have a range of connotations. For example, the image of a rose may call forth associations of love, passion, transience, fragility, youth and beauty, among others. Depending upon the context, such an image could be interpreted in a variety of ways, as in Blake's lyric, "The Sick Rose." Though this power of symbolic representation characterizes all language, poetry most particularly endows the concrete imagery evoked through language with a larger meaning. Such meaning is implied rather than explicitly stated; indeed, much of the power of symbolic language lies in the reader's ability to make meaningful sense of it.

Syncopé: in poetry, the dropping of a letter or syllable from the middle of a word, as in "trav'ler." Such a contraction allows a line to stay within a metrical scheme. See also catalexis and elision.

Synecdoche: a kind of metonymy in which a writer substitutes the name of a part of something to signify the whole: for example, "sail" for ship or "hand" for a member of the ship's crew.

Tercet: a group, or stanza, of three lines, often linked by an interlocking rhyme scheme as in terza rima. See also triplet.

Terza Rima: an arrangement of tercets interlocked by a rhyme scheme of aba bcb cdc ded, etc., and ending with a couplet that rhymes with the second-last line of the final tercet (for example, efe, ff). See, for example, Percy Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind."

Tetrameter: a line of poetry containing four metrical feet.

Theme: the governing idea of a discourse, conveyed through the development of the subject, and through the recurrence of certain words, sounds, or metrical patterns. See also motif.

Third-Person Narrative: See narrative perspective.

Tone: the writer's attitude toward a given subject or audience, as expressed through an authorial persona or "voice." Tone can be projected through particular choices of wording, imagery, figures of speech, and rhythmic devices. Compare mood.

Tories: See Political Parties.

Tragedy: in the traditional definition originating in discussions of ancient Greek drama, a serious narrative recounting the downfall of the protagonist. More loosely, the term has been applied to a wide variety of literary forms in which the tone is predominantly a dark one and the narrative does not end happily.

Transcendentalism: a philosophical movement that influenced such Victorian writers as Thomas Carlyle and Robert Browning. Also a mode of Romantic thought, Transcendentalism places the supernatural and the natural within one great Unity and believes that each individual person embodies aspects of the divine.

Trimeter: a line of poetry containing three metrical feet.

Triolet: a French form in which the first line appears three times in a poem of only eight lines. The first line is repeated at lines 4 and 7; the second line is repeated in line 8. The triolet has only two rhymes: abaaabab.

Triple Foot: poetic foot of three syllables. The possible varieties of triple foot are the anapest (in which two unstressed syllables are followed by a stressed syllable), the dactyl (in which a stressed syllable is followed by two unstressed lines), and the mollossus (in which all three syllables are stressed equally). English poetry tends to use duple rhythms far more frequently than triple rhythms.

Triplet: a group of three lines with the same end-rhyme, much used by eighteenth-century poets to vary or punctuate the flow of couplets. See also tercet.

Trivium: group of three academic subjects (dialectic, grammar, and rhetoric) that were part of the university curriculum in the Middle Ages. Their study precedes that of the more advanced subjects of the quadrivium.

Trochee: a metrical foot containing one strong stress followed by one weak stress: / x (heaven, lover).

Trope: any figure of speech that plays on our understandings of words to extend, alter, or transform "literal" meaning. Common tropes include metaphor, simile, personification, hyperbole, metonymy, oxymoron, synecdoche, and irony. See also figures of speech, above.

Turn (Italian "volta"): the point in a sonnet where the mood or argument changes. The turn may occur between the octave and sestet, i.e., after the eighth line, or in the final couplet, depending on the kind of sonnet.

Unities: Many literary theorists of the late sixteenth through late eighteenth centuries held that a play should ideally be presented as representing a single place, and confining the action to a single day and a single dominant event. They disapproved of plots involving gaps or long periods of time, shifts in place, or subplots. These concepts, which came to be referred to as the unities of space, time, and action, were based on a misreading of classical authorities (principally of Aristotle).

Vers de société: literally, “verse about society.” The term originated with poetry written by aristocrats and upper-middle-class poets that specifically disavows the ambition of creating “high art” while treating the concerns of their own group in verse forms that demonstrate a high degree of formal control (e.g., artful rhymes, surprising turns of diction).

Vers libre: See free verse above.

Verse: a general term for works of poetry, usually referring to poems that incorporate some kind of metrical structure. The term may also describe a line of poetry, though more frequently it is applied to a stanza.

Villanelle: a poem usually consisting of 19 lines, with five 3-line stanzas (tercets) rhyming aba, and a concluding quatrain rhyming abaa. The first and third lines of the first tercet are repeated at fixed intervals throughout the rest of the poem. See, for example, Dylan Thomas’s “Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night.”

Whigs: See Political Parties.

Workhouse: public institution in which the poor were provided with a minimal level of sustenance and with lodging in exchange for work performed. Early workhouses were typically administered by individual parishes. In 1834 a unified system covering all of England and Wales was put into effect.

Zeugma: a figure of speech (trope) in which one word links or “yokes” two others in the same sentence, often to comic or ironic effect. For example, a verb may govern two objects, as in Pope’s line “Or stain her honour, or her new brocade.”

PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

PRINT ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Anonymous. "Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, Who Was Beheaded in 1570," from An Anthology of Scottish Women Poets, edited by Catherine Kerrigan; translated from the original Gaelic by Meg Bateman. Edinburgh University Press, 1991.

Dafydd ap Gwilym. "The Poet and the Grey Friar," translated by A. Cynfael Lake; "The Ruin," translated by Gwyn Jones, from The Oxford Book of Welsh Verse in English, edited by Gwyn Jones. Oxford University Press, 1977. Reprinted with the permission of the Estate of Gwyn Jones.

Dafydd ap Gwilym. "The Skylark," "The Gull," "Trouble at an Inn," and "Morfudd Like the Sun," translated by Dafydd Johnston, from Dafydd ap Gwilym.net, published by the Welsh Department, Swansea University (<http://dafyddapgwilym.net/>). Reprinted with the permission of Dafydd Johnston.

Elis Gruffydd. "Llywelyn and the Fool," from Songs and Tales From Early Ireland and Wales, translated and introduced by Patrick K. Ford. Belmont, MA: Ford & Bailie, 1999. Reprinted with the permission of Patrick K. Ford.

"If this, our life, be less than but a day," and "When you are very old, by candle's flame," from Lyrics of The French Renaissance: Marot, Du Bellay, Ronsard, translated by Norman R. Shapiro. Copyright © Yale University Press, 2002.

Isabel, Countess of Argyll. "There's a Young Man in Pursuit of Me," and "Woe to the One Whose Sickness is Love," from An Anthology of Scottish Women Poets, edited by Catherine Kerrigan; translated from the original Gaelic by Meg Bateman. Edinburgh University Press, 1991.

Marlowe, Christopher. The Tragical History of Dr. Faustus, edited by Michael Keefer. Reproduced with permission of the editor.

Gwerful Mechain. "To the Vagina," and "White Flour, Earthflesh, Cold Fleece," from Orality and Morality: Early Welsh Women's Poetry, by Katie Gramich. As seen at <http://www2.lingue.unibo.it/acume/acumedvd/Essays%20ACUME/AcumeGramichfinal.pdf>. Reprinted with the permission of Katie Gramich.

Geoffrey Monmouth. Excerpt from The History of the Kings of Britain, translated and edited by Michael A. Faletra. Broadview Press, 2008. Reproduced with the permission of the translator and editor.

Geoffrey of the Glens. ["This caps all their tricks ..."] ("Confirmation of Cromwellian Confiscations," 1661) from Eyewitness to Irish History, by Peter Berresford Ellis. John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 2004.

Aodhagán Ó Rathaille. "The Ruin that Befell the Great Families of Ireland," from Ó Rathaille, translated by Michael Hartnett. The Gallery Press, 1998, 1999. Reprinted with the kind permission of the Estate of Michael Hartnett, c/o The Gallery Press, Loughcrew, Oldcastle, County Meath, Ireland.

Tudur Penyllyn. "Conversation Between a Welshman and an Englishwoman," translated by Patricia Malone, from Medieval Welsh Erotic Poetry, edited by Dafydd Johnson. Bridgend: Seren, 1998.

Gaspara Stampa. "When in my weeping I inquire of Love," from Women Poets of the Italian Renaissance: Courtly Ladies and Courtesans. Laura Anna Stortoni, Editor; Laura Anna Stortoni and Mary Prentice Lillie, Translators. New York: Italica Press, 1997. Reprinted with the permission of Italica Press.

Nicholas Watson and Jacqueline Jenkins, editors. Excerpts from The Writings of Julian of Norwich: A Vision Showed to a Devout Woman and A Revelation of Love, Penn State University Press. Copyright © 2006, the Pennsylvania State University.

WEBSITE ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

John Gower. "The Tale of Jason and Medea," from Volume 3 of Confessio Amantis, edited by Russel A. Peck, with Latin translations by Andrew Galloway; lines 3343–4229. TEAMS Middle English Texts Series, Kalamazoo, MI: Medieval Institute Publications, 2004. Reprinted with the permission of Medieval Institute Publications.

Elis Gruffydd. from Songs and Tales From Early Ireland and Wales, translated and introduced by Patrick K. Ford. Belmont, MA: Ford & Bailie, 1999. Reprinted with the permission of Patrick K. Ford.

Gwerful Mechain. "Christ's Suffering," from Welsh Women's Poetry, edited by Katie Gramich and Catherine Brennan. Translated by Katie Gramich. Honno Welsh Women's Press, 2003. Reprinted with the permission of Katie Gramich.

Piozzi, Hester Lynch Salusbury Thrale. Reprinted by permission of the publisher from The Thrales of Sreatham Park, edited by Mary Hyde. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, copyright © 1976, 1977 by Mary Hyde.

Nicholas Watson and Jacqueline Jenkins, editors. Excerpts from The Writings of Julian of Norwich: A Vision Showed to a Devout Woman and A Revelation of Love, Penn State University Press. Copyright © 2006, the Pennsylvania State University.

ILLUSTRATION CREDITS

Anonymous. Portrait of Dido Elizabeth Belle and Lady Elizabeth Murray, c. 1777. From the collection of the Earl of Mansfield, Scone Palace, Perth, Scotland.

Geoffrey Chaucer. Opening page and detail of The Prioress's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript. The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 148 v.

John Donne. Sonnet 10 ("Batter my heart"), in St. Paul's Cathedral Library MS 49. B. 43, fol. 60r (Donne Variorum siglum SP1). © The Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral. Image from DigitalDonne: The Online Variorum (<http://donnevariorum.tamu.edu/>), courtesy of The Variorum Edition of the Poetry of John Donne.

Page [xx]: The Auchinleck Manuscript (National Library of Scotland, Advocates' MS. 19.2.1), fol. 302r, the last 26 lines of the first column (lines 408–34). The National Library of Scotland.

Page [xx]: The Vaux Passional (Peniarth MS 482D), f. 9r. Llyfrgell Genedlaethol Cymru / National Library of Wales.

Page [xx]: The National Portrait Gallery, London. [More]

Page [xx]: Page from William Tyndale's New Testament, 1526. The British Library, C.188.a.17

Page [xx]: The National Portrait Gallery, London [Milton]

Page [xx]: The National Portrait Gallery, London [Pepys]

Page [xx]: The National Portrait Gallery, London [Wilmot]

Page [xx]: The National Portrait Gallery, London [Piozzi]

Information on all translations used is provided in footnotes at the beginning of selections. Copyright permission to reproduce material translated or edited for this anthology and material reproduced or adapted here that originally appeared in other books published by Broadview Press may be sought from Broadview.

The publisher has endeavored to contact rights holders of all copyright material and would appreciate receiving any information as to errors or omissions.

INDEX OF FIRST LINES

- A broken ALTAR, Lord thy servant rears 962
 A creature came to a council of men 79
 A married state affords but little ease 988
 A marvelous thing hangs by a man's thigh 79
 A milk-white hair-lace wound up all her hairs 1157
 A moth ate words. A marvelous fate 79
 A poet's cat, sedate and grave (website)
 A povre wydwe somdeel stape in age 374
 A strife is grown between Virtue and Love 735
 A sweet disorder in the dress 956
 A trader I am to the African shore (website)
 A troop of six that came to my house 647
 A woman's face with nature's own hand painted 887
 Absence, hear thou my protestation 634
 Accuse me thus: that I have scanted all 894
 Adam lay ibounden 208
 Adieu, New-England's smiling meads 1746
 After so long a race as I have run 728
 After the death of the poets, whose riches were poems and wit 651
 Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see 738
 Alas for him who looks on Enniskillen 644
 Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss 612
 Alas! so all things now do hold their peace 621
 Alas, 'tis true, I have gone here and there 893
 All human things are subject to decay 1183
 All kings, and all their favourites 918
 All my past life is mine no more 1327
 Always the one alone longs for mercy 66
 An earring round may well a zodiac be 1150
 Armed with thy sad last gift—the pow'r to die (website)
 As an unperfect actor on the stage 888
 As due by many titles I resign 935
 As Rochefoucauld his maxims drew 1397
 As some brave admiral, in former war 1328
 As some grave matron bred on rural downs (website)
 As the sweet sweat of roses in a still 924
 As virtuous men pass mildly away 922
 As when the glorious magazine of light 989
 At court I met it, in clothes brave enough 902
 At length, by so much importunity pressed 1561
 At the round earth's imagined corners, blow 935
 At times I travel under the thronging waves 77
 Atá fleasgach ar mo thí 640
 Attend my lays, ye ever honour'd nine 1743
 Ave Maria, gratia plena 428
 Avenge O Lord thy slaughtered saints, whose bones 1005
 Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things 1541
 Batter my heart, three personed God; for you 938
 Be nought dismayd that her unmovèd mind 725
 Be our guide, O Domhnall 637
 Because I breathe not love to every one 736
 Because I oft in dark abstracted guise 733
 Before I see another day (website)
 Betwene Mersh and Averil 205
 Betwixt two ridges of plowed land lay Wat 1155
 Blame not my lute, for he must sound 613
 Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears 919
 Blest he who like Ulysses voyaged fair and wide 628
 Brave infant of Saguntum, clear 909
 Bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale 209
 Bristol, thine heart hath throbb'd to glory.—Slaves 1688
 Busy old fool, unruly Sun 916
 But anxious cares the pensive nymph oppressed 1529
 But be contented when that fell arrest 891
 But wherefore do not you a mightier way 887
 By neer resemblance see that Bird betray'd 1387
 Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe 903
 Careful observers may foretell the hour 1392
 Cease, Wilberforce, to urge thy generous aim (website)
 Celestial choir! enthroned in realms of light 1748
 Cherry-lipped Adonis in his snowy shape 633
 Chloe, in verse by your command I write 1329
 Close by those meads forever crowned with flow'rs 1526
 Come leave the loathèd stage 908
 Come, let me write. "And to what end?" To ease 733
 Come live with me and be my love 845, 921
 Come Madam, come, all rest my powers defy 925
 Come, my Lucasia, since we see 990
 Come, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of peace 733
 Come, sons of summer, by whose toil 959
 Comming to kisse her lyps, (such grace I found) 726
 Condemn me not for making such a coil 1148
 Condemned by fate to wayward curse (website)
 Condemned to Hope's delusive mine 1636
 Could we stop the time that's flying 1387

- Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem 427
 Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud 1005
 Cupid laid by his brand, and fell asleep 897
 Dark was the dawn, and o'er the deep (website)
 Death be not proud, though some have called thee 936
 Death is the cook of Nature; and we find 1156
 Death, thou wast once an uncouth hideous thing 973
 Devouring time, blunt thou the lion's paws 887
 Dian, that fain would cheer her friend the Night 737
 Did I, my lines intend for public view 1384
 Donne, the delight of Phoebus and each muse 903
 Drink to me only, with thine eyes 906
 Dull atoms flat, when they together join 1149
 Dydd daed Saesnes gyffes, gain 661
 Early before daybreak the household arose 255
 Early on Lammas morning 641
 Envious wits, what hath been mine offence 739
 Even such is time, which takes in trust 815
 Every poet, drunken fool 662
 Experience, though noon auctoritee 331
 Fair gull on the tide, indeed 656
 Fair is my love, and cruel as she's fair 631
 Fair lady, will you go with me 59
 Farewell, Love, and all thy laws forever 611
 Farewell (sweet Cooke-ham) where I first obtained 807
 Farewell this world, I take my leve forever 208
 Farewell—thou art too dear for my possessing 891
 Farewell, thou child of my right hand, and joy 903
 Farewell, thou thing, time-past so known, so dear 957
 Farewell, too little and too lately known 1186
 Five hours (and who can do it less in?) 1395
 Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death wound; fly 731
 Fond woman, which wouldst have thy husband die 924
 For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love 916
 For I will consider my Cat Jeoffry 1677
 Forced by fraud and by Saxon oppression 649
 Foweles in the frith 205
 Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king 727
 From dark abodes to fair ethereal light 1742
 From fairest creatures we desire increase 886
 From harmony, from heav'nly harmony 1187
 From this the muse rich consolation draws 1749
 From you have I been absent in the spring 892
 Full erly before the day the folk uprysen 255
 Full many a glorious morning have I seen 888
 Gather ye rosebuds while ye may 959
 Get up! get up for shame! the blooming morn 958
 Go, and catch a falling star 915
 Go, soul, the body's guest 813
 God bless our good and gracious King 1333
 God moves in a mysterious way 1719
 Going to Rome 62
 Gone are all the noble poets 651
 Good day, fine, nimble Englishwoman 661
 Grief find the words, for thou hast made my brain 737
 Had we but world enough, and time 979
 Hail, happy day, when, smiling like the morn 1745
 Hail, happy saint, on thine immortal throne 1750
 Hail happy saint on thy immortal throne 1750
 Hail Mary, full of grace 429
 Happy ye leaves when as those lilly hands 725
 Hark how the Mower Damon sung 981
 Having been tenant long to a rich Lord 962
 Having this day my horse, my hand, my lance 734
 Hence vain deluding joys 998
 Here, hold this glove (this milk-white cheverel glove 633
 Here lies, to each her parents' ruth 903
 Hermaphrodite in sense in Art a monster 948
 Hermaphrodite in show, in deed a monster 949
 Heureux qui, comme Ulysse, a fait un beau voyage 628
 High on a throne of royal state, which far 1030
 "Hoo," quod the Knyght, "good sire 373
 How fresh, O Lord, how sweet and clean 972
 How like a winter hath my absence been 892
 How many paltry, foolish, painted things 631
 How oft when thou, my music, music play'st 894
 How should I praise thee, Lord! How should my rhymes 965
 How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth 1004
 How vainly men themselves amaze 983
 I am a little world made cunningly 935
 I am a noble thing, known to men 80
 I am ebbing like the sea 62
 I am waiting for a soft-spoken girl 657
 I believe in God the Father Almighty 428
 I came to a choice town 656
 I can sing a true song of myself 68
 I did not live until this time 990
 I grieve, and dare not show my discontent 761
 I have a gentil cock 207
 I know a noble guest within the gates 79
 I know the ways of learning; both the head 968
 I loved a child of this cuntree 207
 I make this song of myself, deeply sorrowing 70
 I now think Love is rather deaf than blind 909
 I on my horse, and Love on me doth try 735

- I once was a warrior's weapon, but now 78
 I shall tell you the adventure 188
 I sing of a maiden 208
 I sing of brooks, of blossoms, birds, and bowers 956
 I sing the sofa. I, who lately sang (website)
 I struck the board, and cried, No more 971
 I think not on the state, nor am concerned 989
 I wonder by my troth, what thou, and I 915
 I would in rich and golden coloured rain 629
 I' th' isle of Britain, long since famous grown 1324
 If all the world and love were young 813
 If heaven has into being deigned to call 1684
 If I profane with my unworthiest hand 632
 If poisonous minerals, and if that tree 936
 If this, our life, be less than but a day 628
 If thy soul check thee that I come so near 895
 Immortal bard! Thou favorite of the nine! (website)
 In every place ye may well see 210
 In Flaundres whilom was a compaignye 356
 In highest way of heav'n the Sun did ride 732
 In martial sports I had my cunning tried 735
 In pious times, ere priestcraft did begin 1168
 In such a night, when every louder wind 1388
 In th'olde dayes of Kyng Arthour 345
 In the old age black was not counted fair 894
 In these deep solitudes and awful cells 1535
 In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn 945
 In vain, dear Madam, yes in vain you strive (website)
 In vain to me the smiling Mornings shine 1672
 Is maírg dá ngalar an grádh 640
 It never occurred to me—what a thought 658
 It will be looked for, book, when some but see 902
 Je vouldroy bien richement jaunissant 629
 Joy, I did lock thee up: but some bad man 970
 Joy of my life, full oft for loving you 728
 Just like unto a nest of boxes round 1150
 Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids 926
 Know then thyself, presume not God to scan 1545
 L'aventure d'un autre lai 188
 Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this 939
 Let me confess that we two must be twain 889
 Let me not to the marriage of true minds 893
 Let me pour forth 919
 Let not my love be called idolatry 892
 Let Observation, with extensive view 1631
 Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore 889
 Listen 85
 Listen! I will speak of the sweetest dream 72
 Lo, as a careful housewife runs to catch 895
 Lo I the man, whose Muse whilome did maske 670
 Long have I heard, and yet I hear the sounds 630
 Lord, how can man preach thy eternal word 966
 Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store 963
 "Lordynges," quod he, "in chirches whan I preche 353
 Love, a child, is ever crying 945
 Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back 973
 Love, that doth reign and live within my thought 620
 Loving in truth, and fain in verse my love to show 731
 Luxurious man, to bring his vice in use 980
 Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace 727
 Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde 726
 Lyke as the Culver on the barèd bough 728
 Madame, ye ben of al beaute shryne 296
 Maecenas, you, beneath the myrtle shade 1740
 Mark but this flea, and mark in this 920
 May a dagger pierce your heart 663
 Me and white Pangur 60
 Meeting with Time, slack thing, said I 970
 Messe ocus Pangur bán 59
 Methought I saw my late espoused saint 1006
 Methought I saw the grave where Laura lay 812
 Mine own John Poyns, since ye delight to know 614
 Mneme begin. Inspire, ye sacred nine 1743
 Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade 727
 Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day 727
 Muses, I oft invoked your holy aid 736
 My galley chargèd with forgetfulness 626
 My garment is silent when I tread the ground 78
 My God, I heard this day 969
 My hall is not silent, but I am not loud 79
 My lefe is faren in a lond 210
 My love is as a fever, longing still 896
 My lute, awake! Perform the last 613
 My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun 895
 My pity, that Carthy's heirs are weaklings 652
 Naked she lay, clasped in my longing arms 1332
 Nature that washed her hands in milk 814
 No crooked leg, no bleared eye 761
 No longer mourn for me when I am dead 890
 No more be grieved at that which thou hast done 889
 No sooner, Flavio, was you gone 1385
 Not at first sight, nor with a dribbed shot 731
 Not marble, nor the gilded monuments 889
 Not marching now in fields of Thracimene 847
 Not with more glories, in th' ethereal plain 1524
 Nothing but a ruin now 659

- Now Pontius Pilate is to judge the cause 806
 Now thou hast loved me one whole day 915
 Now you, the vigorous, who daily here 1322
 O how I faint when I of you do write 891
 O joy too high for my low style to show 736
 O Lord, oure Lord, thy name how merveillous 366
 O love, how thou art tired out with rhyme 1157
 O Nature, Nature, hearken to my cry 1155
 O never say that I was false of heart 893
 O woman full of wiles 648
 O, who shall from this dungeon raise 976
 Oak. Why cut you off my boughs, both large and long 1152
 Obscurest night involved the sky 1719
 Of Mans First Disobedience, and the Fruit 1017
 Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay 726
 Of tournaments that are forbade 429
 Oft with true sighs, oft with uncallèd tears 736
 Oh absent presence, Stella is not here 739
 Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness (website)
 Oh fortune, thy wresting wavering state 760
 Oh happy Thames, that didst my Stella bear 739
 Oh tears, no tears, but rain from Beauty's skies 738
 Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one 938
 On Hellespont, guilty of true-loves' blood 834
 One day I wrote her name upon the strand 728
 One day the amorous Lysander 1231
 Our Father, who art in heaven 428
 Oure Hoost gan to swere as he were wood 353
 Pace non trovo et non ò da far guerra 625
 Pardon mine ears, both I and they do pray 735
 Pater noster, qui es in caelis 428
 Peace. War makes the vulgar multitude to drink 1154
 Pity whose complaint is love 641
 Poets, like cudgeled bullies, never do 1272
 Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth 896
 Pray thee take care, that tak'st my book in hand 902
 Prayer the Church's banquet, Angels' age 965
 Quand vous serez bien vielle, au soir à la chandelle 630
 Quando io dimando nel mio pianto Amore 627
 Quant de lais faire m'entremet 180
 Queen and huntress, chaste and fair 911
 Raising my hopes on hills of high desire 631
 Reading my verses, I like't them so well 1148
 Rich fools there be, whose base and filthy heart 732
 See! Winter comes, to rule the varied year 1622
 See! with what pale and mournful look appears 1697
 See with what simplicity 980
 Set me whereas the sun doth parch the green 620
 Shall I compare thee to a summer's day 887
 Shall the poor AFRICAN, the passive Slave (website)
 She said; the pitying audience melt in tears 1532 Show me, dear Christ, Thy spouse, so bright and clear 938
 Shut, shut the door, good John! (fatigued I said) 1549
 Si nostre vie est moins qu'une journée 628
 Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea 890
 Since I am coming to that holy room 940
 Since I have undertaken to compose lais 180
 Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part 631
 Sing lullaby, as women do 633
 Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls 928
 Sith Cynthia is ascended to that rest 806
 Siþþen þe sege and þe assaut watz sesed at Troye 292
 Sithen the sege and the assaut watz sesed at Troye 226
 Small atoms of themselves a world may make 1148
 So cruel prison how could betide, alas 621
 So shall I live supposing thou art true 891
 Some by industry of learning found 1150
 Some strong enemy snatched my life 78
 Something's swelling over in the corner 79
 Sometimes my lord constrains me closely 77
 Soul's joy, bend not those morning stars from me 734
 Stella is sick, and in that sickbed lies 738
 Stella oft sees the very face of woe 734
 Stella, since thou so right a princess art 740
 Stella, the fullness of my thoughts of thee 735
 Stella this day is thirty-four 1393
 Still to be neat, still to be dressed 912
 Stond well, moder, under Rode 206
 Sumer is icumen in 205
 Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright 968
 Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere 726
 Tagus, farewell, that westward with thy streams 612
 Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame 894
 That time of year thou mayst in me behold 890
 The curfew tolls the knell of parting day 1673
 The curious wits seeing dull pensiveness 732
 The Doctor in a clean starched band 1560
 The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy 761
 The famous warriors of the anticke world 727
 The fleet Astronomer can bore 967
 The forward youth that would appear 984
 The grateful tribute of these rural lays (website)
 The Greekës chieftains, all irked with the war 622
 The hearts thus intermixed speak 991

- The little love-god lying once asleep 897
 The long love that in my thought doth harbour 611
 The news I hear from distant Erin 649
 The pillar perished is whereto I leant 611
 The powerful prayers of the skylark 655
 The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre 725
 The square flat atoms, as dull earth appear 1149
 The tea-kettle bubbled, the tea things were set (website)
 The twentieth year is well nigh past (website)
 The wanton troopers riding by 977
 The wind is wild tonight 62
 The wisest scholar of the wight most wise 733
 The world's purpose hides from us 665
 The wretched Flavia on her couch reclined 1558
 Ther was in Asye in a greet cite 367
 There's a young man in pursuit of me 640
 They flee from me that sometime did me seek 612
 They that have power to hurt and will do none 892
 Think not this paper comes with vain pretense 1562
 This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas 652
 This day, whate'er the fates decree 1394
 This hanselle hatz Arthur of aventurus on fyrst 239
 This holy season fit to fast and pray 725
 This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint 935
 This morning, timely rapt with holy fire 904
 This to the crown, and blessing of my life 1385
 This wonder has Arthur as his first New Year's gift 239
 Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show 905
 Though dusty wits dare scorn astrology 733
 Though I am young, and cannot tell 911
 Thought, with good cause thou lik'st so well the Night 737
 Three things there be that prosper up apace 812
 Throw away thy rod 972
 Thus life and death, and young and old 1149
 Thy Plains, O Abram! And thy pleasing views (website)
 Thy various works, imperial queen, we see 1744
 Tis hard to say, if greater want of skill 1515
 'Tis the year's midnight, and it is the day's 920
 'Tis true, 'tis day; what though it be 918
 To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name 907
 To show the lab'ring bosom's deep intent 1746
 To yow, my purs, and to non other wight 386
 Toll for the brave (website)
 Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house and I 904
 Truce, gentle Love, a parley now I crave 632
 'Twas mercy brought me from my Pagan land 1742
 'Twas on a lofty vase's side 1672
 Twice forty months of wedlock I did stay 991
 Twice or thrice had I loved thee 918
 Two loves I have, of comfort and despair 896
 Un fodd yw'r byd, cyngyd cêl 665
 Unhappy sight, and hath she vanished by 739
 Until the stars of heaven be numbered 643
 Vulcan begat me; Minerva me taught 612
 We redeth oft and findeth y-write (website)
 Wel seyde, by corpus dominus," quod oure Hoost 366
 Were I (who to my cost already am 1325
 Whan that Aprill with hise shoures soote 300
 Whan that the Knyght hath thus his tale ytoold 318
 What art thou, Spleen, which every thing dost ape 1383
 What beck'ning ghost, along the moonlight shade 1534
 What bodies else but Man's did Nature make 1151
 What dire offence from am'rous causes springs 1522
 What eagle can behold her sun-bright eye 632
 What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses 726
 What, have I thus betrayed my liberty 734
 What if this present were the world's last night 936
 What man is so bold in mind and so clever 76
 What this mountaigne bymeneth and the merke dale 436
 When Britain first, at Heaven's command 1628
 When by thy scorn, O murd'ress, I am dead 921
 When far-spent night persuades each mortal eye 738
 When first Diana leaves her bed 1391
 When first my lines of heav'nly joys made mention 969
 When first thou didst entice to thee my heart 964
 When for the thorns with which I long, too long 975
 When forty winters shall besiege thy brow 886
 When friends or fortune frown on Mira's lay (website)
 When God at first made man 971
 When I consider everything that grows 886
 When I consider how my light is spent 1005
 When I do count the clock that tells the time 886
 When I have seen by time's fell hand defaced 890
 When I was fair and young, and favour graced me 763
 When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes 888
 When in my weeping I inquire of Love 627
 When in the chronicle of wasted time 893
 When men shall find thy flower, thy glory pass 631
 When my devotions could not pierce 967
 When my grave is broke up again 923
 When my love swears that she is made of truth 895
 When Nature made her chief work, Stella's eyes 731
 When night's black mantle could most darkness prove 943

- When Sorrow (using mine own fire's might) 740
 When that rich soul which to her heaven is gone 929
 When the sheep are in the fauld, and the kye at hame 654
 When the siege and the assault were ended at Troy 226
 When to the sessions of sweet silent thought 888
 When you are very old, by candle's flame 630
 Whenas in silks my Julia goes 960
 Where be those roses gone, which sweetened so our eyes 738
 Where, like a pillow on a bed 922
 Where the remote Bermudas ride 976
 While an intrinsic ardor prompts to write 1741
 While that my soul repairs to her devotion 966
 Whilom ther was dwellynge at Oxenford 319
 White flour, earthflesh, black mountain with cold fleece 663
 Who list his wealth and ease retain 614
 Who says that fictions only and false hair 965
 Who taught thee conflict with the pow'rs of night 1743
 Who will in fairest book of Nature know 736
 Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will 895
 Whoso list to hunt, I know where is a hind 627
 Why should our damned tyrants oblige us to live 1316
 Wilt Thou forgive that sin where I begun 939
 With how sad steps, oh Moon, thou climb'st the skies 733
 With what sharp checks I in myself am shent 731
 Woe is me that the celebrated 659
 Woe to the one whose sickness is love 640
 Wondrous is this wall's foundation—wyrd has broken 70
 Wyatt resteth here, that quick could never rest 622
 Ye distant spires, ye antique tow'rs 1670
 Ye tradefull Merchants, that with weary toyle 725
 Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more 1001
 Yet Sighs, dear Sighs, indeed true friends you are 737
 Your subjects hope, dread Sire 1742
 Your words, my friend, (right healthful caustics) 732

INDEX OF AUTHORS AND TITLES

- A Bé Find, in rega lim 59
A bhean lán de stuaim 648
Abraham (website)
Abram's Plains (website)
Absalom and Achitophel: A Poem 1168
Account of the Heresy Trial of Margery Baxter 439 Account of the Slave Trade on the Coast of Africa (website)
Adam lay ibounden 208
Addison, Joseph 1590, 1594, 1603, 1609
Affliction (I) 964
African, The (website)
After the Death of the Poets 651
Agrippa, Henricus Cornelius 878
Air and Angels 918
Alas! So All Things Now Do Hold Their Peace 621
Alexander Pope 1662
All Things Are Governed by Atoms 1149
Altar, The 962
American Crisis, The 1715
Anatomy of the World, An 929
Anecdotes Relating to the Battle of Quebec (website)
Anniversary, The 918
Answer to the Queen's Highness to the petitions proponed unto her by the Lower House concerning her marriage, The (website)
Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber, An 1587
Apology of Negro Slavery, An (website)
Aposde's Creed, The 427
Apparition, The 921
Areopagitica 1006
Argument of His Book, The 956
Astrophil and Stella 731
Atá Fleasgach Ar Mo Thí 640
Auld Robin Gray 654
Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself, The 815
Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, The 1710
Ælfrid of Eynsham (website)
Bacon, Francis 823
Bait, The 921
Barbault, Anna Laetitia (website)
Bard, The (website)
Barnfield, Richard 633
Battle of Drumleene, The 643
Battle of Maldon, The 56
Bear with Thee, O Letter, My Blessing 649
Bede 41
Behn, Aphra 1230
Beowulf 81
Bermudas 976
Betwene Mersh and Averil 205
Bicknell, John (website)
Bisclavret (The Werewolf) 180
Bloomfield, Robert (website)
Bolingbroke (website)
Book of Margery Kempe, The 405
Boswell, James 1594
Break of Day 918
Bring us in good ale 209
Bull of Excommunication Against Elizabeth,
 The (website)
Bunch of Grapes, The 970
Burke, Edmund 1708
By neer resemblance that Bird betray'd 1387
Canonization, The 916
Canons of the Fourth Lateran Council 433
Canterbury Tales, The 300
Captive American, The 1704
Cary, Thomas (website)
Castaway, The 1719
Causes of the Wretched Condition of Ireland 1508
Cavendish, Margaret 1146
Cecil, William (website)
Cent, Siôn 665
Certain Books of Virgil's Aeneis Book II 622
Charter of King John to the Jews 443
Chaucer, Geoffrey 293 (website)
Chaucer's Retraction 385
Choice of Emblems, A 801 (website)
Christ's Suffering (website)
Chronicle 216, 442, 664 (website)
Chronicles 213, 221
Church-Monuments 966
Cibber, Colley 1587
Clarkson, Thomas (website)
Clerimont's Song 912

- Coleridge, Samuel Taylor (website)
 Collar, The 971
Collier, Mary (website)
 Commissioners of the Customs in Scotland, Report of the Examination of the Emigrants from the Counties of Caithness and Sutherland on Board the Ship Bachelor of Leith Bound to Wilmington in North Carolina 1698
 Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman (website)
 Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse A Supplication to King Henry 386
 Confessio Amantis (website)
 Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes 1682
 Continuation of the Observations on Mr. Oldcastle's Remarks upon the English History, The (website)
 Conversation between a Welshman and an Englishwoman 661
Cooke, Ebenezer (website)
 Copy of a Letter sent by the Author's Master to the Publisher 1756
 Corinna's Going A-Maying 958
 Coronet, The 975
 Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, The (website)
 Country Wife, The 1272
 Covent-Garden Journal, The No. 4 and 6 (website)
Cowper, William 1718 (website)
Cromwell, Oliver (website)
 Crown of Sonnets Dedicated to Love, A 945
 Crucifixion, The 445
 Crumble Hall (website)
Cugoano, Quobna Ottobah (website)
 Cynthia 633
 Cywydd y Cedor 660
 D'Aithle na bhFileadh n-Uasal 651
Dafydd ap Gwilym 655
 Damon the Mower 981
Daniel, Samuel 631
Davies of Hereford, John 632
Davies, Sir John 632
Day, Thomas (website)
 De Nugis Curialium (website)
 De Occulta Philosophia 878
de Ronsard, Pierre 629
 Death 973
 Declaration by the Representatives of the USA 1711
 Defence of Poesy, The 740
Defoe, Daniel 1335 (website)
 Delia 631
 Delight in Disorder 956
Deloney, Thomas (website)
 Denial 967
Denny, Edward, Baron of Walsingham 949
 Description of a City Shower, A 1392
 Description of a New World, Called the Blazing World, The 1157
 Description of Cooke-ham, The 807
 Dialogue between an Oak, and a Man Cutting Him Down, A 1152
 Dialogue between the Soul and Body, A 976
 Dialogue betwixt Peace, and War, A 1154
 Dialogue betwixt the Body and the Mind, A 1151
 Diary, The 1201
 Disabled Debauchee, The 1328
 Disappointment, The 1231
 Discipline 972
 Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana, The 815
 Domhnall, To 637
Donne, John 913
 Douay-Rheims Bible 600
 Doubt of Future Foes, The 761
 Dr. Faustus, the "B" Text (website)
Drayton, Michael 631
 Dream of the Rood, The 72
Dryden, John 1165
Du Bellay, Joachim 628
Duck, Stephen (website)
 Dying Negro, A Poem, The (website)
Earle, William (website)
 Earth's Complaint 1155
 Easter Wings 963
 Ecclesiastical History of the English People 42
 Ecstasy, The 922
 Edward I's Order 443
 Elegies (Donne) 924
 Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady 1534
 Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard 1673
Elizabeth I, Queen of England 759 (website)
 Eloisa to Abelard 1535
 English Bible 599
 Enniskillen 644
 Epistle from Mr. Pope to Dr. Arbuthnot, An 1549
 Epistle from Mrs. Yonge to Her Husband 1562
 Epistle to a Lady, An (website)
 Epistle to William Wilberforce, Esq., on the Rejection of the Bill for Abolishing the Slave Trade (website)

- Epithalamion (website)
Equaino, Oludah 1722 (website)
Erskine, Thomas 1600
 Essay of Dramatic Poesy, An 1188
 Essay on Criticism, An 1515 (website)
 Essays (Bacon) 825
 Eve's Apology in Defense of Women 806
 Everyman 473
 Excuse for so Much Writ Upon My Verses, An 1148
 Exeter Book Riddles 76
 Faerie Queene, The 668 (website)
Falconbridge, Alexander (website)
 Fantomina: or, Love in a Maze 1566
 Farewell this world, I take my leve forever 208
 Farewell to America. To Mrs. S.W., A 1746
 Farmer's Boy, The (website)
 Female Spectator Book 1, The 1615 (website)
 Female Tatler No. 1, The 1604
Fielding, Henry (website)
Finch, Anne, Countess of Winchilsea 1382
Fionn Ó Dálaigh, Gofraidh 637
 First Anniversary, The 929
 First Satire, The 59
 Flea, The 920
 Flower, The 972
 Foras Feasa ar Éirinn 650
 Four Branches of the Mabinogi, The 156
 Four Principal Figured Atoms Make the Four Elements,
 The 1149
 Fourth Branch: Math, son of Mathonwy, The (website)
 Foweles in the frith 205
Franklin, Benjamin 1700 (website)
 Friendship in Emblem, 991
 Friendship's Mystery, To my Dearest Lucasia 990
Froissart, Jean 213
 Garden, The 983
Gascoigne, George 633
 Gascoigne's Lullaby 633
 Geneva Bible 600
Geoffrey of Monmouth 133
 Gleaner Contemplates the Future Prospects of Women in this 'Enlightened Age,' The (website)
 Golden Speech, The 776
 Gone Are All the Noble Poets 651
 Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward 939
 Good-Morrow, The 915
Gosson, Stephen 757
Gower, John (website)
 Grasmere Journal, The (website)
Gray, Thomas 1669 (website)
Gruffydd, Elis 663 (website)
 Gull, The 655
 Gulling Sonnets 632
 Gulliver's Travels 1407 (website)
 Gwynflawd, daergnawd, oergnu 661
 Hail Mary, The 428
Hand, Elizabeth (website)
 Handlyng Synne 429
Haywood, Eliza 1564, 1615 (website)
Herbert, George 961
 Hero and Leander 834
Herrick, Robert 955
 Hester Thrale's Journal (website)
 His Farewell to Sack 957
 History of Ireland 650
 History of King Lear, The 1586
 History of the Rise, Progress and Accomplishment of the Abolition of the African Slave Trade, The (website)
Hobbes, Thomas 950
 Hock-Cart, or Harvest Home, The 959
 Holy Sonnets 935
 Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland,
 An 984
Howard, Henry, Earl of Surrey 619
Howden, Roger 442
Hrosvitha of Ganersheim (website)
 Hud a Lliw y Byd 663
Hughes, John (website)
 Hunting of the Hare, The 1155
 Hymn to Cynthia 911
 Hymn to God, My God, in My Sickness 940
 Hymn to the Morning, An 1743
 I have a gentil cock 207
 I lovede a child of this cuntree 207
 I sing of a maiden 208
 I would in rich and golden coloured rain 629
 I'w Gwr am ei Churo 660
 Idea 631
 Idler No. 30 1596
 Idler No. 31 [On Idleness] 1644
 Idler No. 49 [Will Marvel] 1645
 Idler No. 81 [On Native Americans] 1646
 If there were, oh! an Hellespont of cream 633
 Il Penseroso 998
 Illusion of the World, The 665
 Imperfect Enjoyment, The 1332

- Impromptu on Charles II 1333
 Information to Those Who Would Remove to America 1700
 Infortunate, The 1694
 Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, The 1722 (website)
 Introduction, The 1384
 Introduction, A Weekly Review of the Affairs of France (website)
 Inviting a Friend to Supper 904
 Invocation 806
 Is acher in gáith innocht 62
 Is Mairg Dá Ngalar An Grádh 640
Isabel, Countess of Argyll 639
 Je vouldroy bien richement jaunissant 629
Jefferson, Thomas 1711
Johnson, Samuel 1629 (website)
Johnson, Susannah 1704
Jonson, Ben 900
 Jordan (1) 965
 Jordan (2) 969
 Journal of a West India Proprietor (website)
 Journal of the Plague Year, A 1372
 Journey to Pennsylvania (website)
 Jubilate Agno 1677
Julian of Norwich 387 (website)
 Karolin's Song 911
Keating, Geoffrey 648
Kempe, Margery 404
 King Lear (website)
 King James Bible 599
Knighton, Henry 216 (website)
 L'Allegro 995
 L'Olive augentée 628
Lackington, James 1598
 Lady's Dressing Room, The 1395
 Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, who was beheaded in 1570 641
 Lament of the Old Woman of Beare, The 62
Langland, William 434
 Lanval 188
Lanyer, Aemilia 804 (website)
Leapor, Mary (website)
 Legend of Good Women, The (website)
 Letter (Ralph of Shrewsbury) 17 August 1348 216
 Letter from Artemisia in the Town to Chloe in the Country, A 1329
 Letter from Ignatius Sancho to Jabez Fisher, in Philadelphia 1758
 Letter to Daphnis, A 1385
 Letter to Elizabeth I Regarding Her Proposed Marriage (website)
 Letter to His Wife 821
 Letter to the English Parliament (17 September 1649) (website)
 Letter to the People of London 215
 Letter to the Vatican (28 August, 1656) (website)
 Letters (Elizabeth I) 769, 772
 Letters (Johnson) 1665
 Letters (Mary, Queen of Scots) 771
 Letters from an American Farmer (website)
 Letters to the Duke of Anjoy (website)
 Leviathan 951
Lewis, Matthew Gregory (website)
 Licensing Act of 1737 1591
 Lie, The 813
 Life and Miracles of St. William of Norwich, The 440
 Life and Remarkable Adventures of Israel R. Potter (website)
 Life of Edward the Second 212
 Life of Samuel Johnson, The 1594
 Light Shining Out of Darkness 1719
Ligon, Richard 1681
Lindsay, Lady Anne 654
 Lives of the English Poets 1658
 Llywelyn and the Fool 665
 Lock, Anne 630
 Look Before You Leap (website)
 Lord's Prayer, The 428
 Love (3) 973
 Love and Life: A Song 1327
 Love, that Doth Reign and Live within My Thought 620
 Lover: A Ballad, The 1561
Lucan, Lady 1696
 Lycidas 1001
 Mac Flecknoe 1183
Malory, Sir Thomas 487 (website)
 Man 969
Manning of Brunne, Robert 429
 Map, Walter (website)
 Marie de France 179
Marlowe, Christopher 831 (website)
 Married State, A 988
Marvell, Andrew 974

- Mechain, Gwerful 662 (website)
 Meditation 17 940
 Meditation of a Penitent Sinner, A 630
 Memoirs of the Forty-Five First Years of the Life of James Lackington, Bookseller 1598
 Memoirs of the Last Ten Years of the Reign of King
 George II (website)
 Merchant of Venice, The (website)
 Messe ocus Pangur Bán 60
 Middle English Lyrics 203
 Miller's Prologue, The 318
 Miller's Tale, The 319
Milton, John 993 (website)
 Mirror, The 658
Mittelberger, Gottlieb (website)
 Mo bheannácht leat a sgríbhinn 649
 Modest Proposal, A 1503
Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley 1557 (website)
Moraley, William 1694
More, Sir Thomas (website)
More, Hannah 1684
 Morfudd fel yr Haul 657
 Morfudd Like the Sun 655
 Morte Darthur 490 (website)
 Motion of the Blood, The 1150
 Mower against Gardens, The 980
Murray, Judith Sargent (website)
 My life is faren in a lond 210
 My Mary (website)
 My Picture Left in Scotland 909
 Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson, A (website)
 Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk 814
 Nature's Cook 1156
 Negro Girl, The (website)
Newton, John (website)
Nicholls, Rev. Robert Boncher (website)
 Nocturnal Reverie, A 1388
 Nocturnal upon St. Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day,
 A 920
 Nonsense of Common-Sense, The (website)
 Notes on the State of Virginia 1758
 Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn,
 The 977
 Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd, The 813
Ó Bruadair, Dáibhí 651
Ó hUiginn, Tadhg Dall 642
Ó Rathaille, Aodhagán 652
 O Woman Full of Wiles 648
O'Donoghue of the Glens, Geoffrey 651
 Obi; or, the History of Three-Fingered Jack (website)
 Observations, Occasioned by the Attempts Made in England to Effect the Abolition of the Slave Trade
 (website)
 Observations on the Importance of the American Revolution 1715
 Observations on the Nature of the Civil Liberty, the Principles of Government, and the Justice and Policy of the War with America (website)
Occom, Samson (website)
 Ode 634
 Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College 1670
 Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat 1672
 Ode to Himself 908
 Of all creatures women be best 210
 Of Love 829
 Of Many Worlds in this World 1150
 Of Marriage and Single Life 826
 Of Studies 827
 Of the Theme of Love 1157
 Of Truth 825
 On Being Brought from Africa to America 1742
 On Imagination 1744
 On Lucy, Countess of Bedford 904
 On Monsieur's Departure 761
 On My First Daughter 903
 On My First Son 903
 On Recollection 1743
 On sgeoil do chradh Magh Fail ni chodlaim oidhche 649
 On Something that Walks Somewhere 902
 On the Death of a Young Gentleman 1743
 On the Death of a Young Lady of Five Years of Age 1742
 On the Death of Dr. Robert Levett 1636
 On the Death of General Wooster 1749
 On the Death of My First and Dearest Child, Hector
 Philips 991
 On the Death of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield 1749
 On the Loss of the Royal George (website)
 On the Miseries of Ireland 649
 On the Present State of Ireland 1696
 On the Slave Trade (website)
 On the Supposition of an Advertisement Appearing in a Morning Paper, of the Publication of a Volume of Poems, by a Servant Maid (website)
 On the Third of September, 1651 989

- Ordinances of Henry III 443
 Ordinances of the Jews 442
 Oroonoko; or, The Royal Slave. A True History 1235
Paine, Thomas 1679
 Pamphilia to Amphilanthus 943
 Paradise Lost 1017
 Pardoner's Prologue, The 351
 Pardoner's Tale, The 356
 Passion of Saint Edmund, King and Martyr,
 The (website)
 Passionate Shepherd to His Love, The 845
 Pater Noster, The 428
 Pearl, The 968
Penn, William (website)
Penyllyn, Tudur 661
Pepys, Samuel 1199
Petrarch, Francesco 625
Philips, Katherine 987
 Picture of Little T.C. in a Prospect of Flowers, The 980
 Piers Plowman 434
Piozzi, Hester Thrale (website)
Pitt, James (website)
Plato 755
 Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave-Trade, A 1688
 Poet and the Grey Friar, The 659
 Poetess's Hasty Resolution, The 1148
Pope Pius V (website)
Pope, Alexander 1513 (website)
Potter, Israel (website)
 Prayer (I) 965
 Preface to the Dictionary, The 1648
 Preface to The Works of William Shakespeare, The 1651
 Present for a Servant-Maid, A 1580
Price, Richard 1715 (website)
 Priest's Eye 430
Prince Edward 215
 Progress of Beauty, The 1391
 Pulley, The 971
 Quand vous serez bien vielle, au soir à la chandelle 630
 Queen's Visiting of the Camp at Tilbury, The (website)
 Quinn, Father Thomas (website)
 Railing Rhymes Returned upon the Author by Mistress
 Mary Wroth 948
Ralegh, Sir Walter 811
Ralph of Shrewsbury 216
 Rambler No. 4 [On Fiction] 1636
 Rambler No. 60 [On Biography] 1639
 Rambler No. 97
 Rambler No. 114 1617
 Rambler No. 148, 170 (website)
 Rambler No. 155 1641
 Rape of the Lock: An Heroi-Comical Poem in Five
 Cantos, The 1521
 Reasons that Induced Dr. S. to Write a Poem Called
 The Lady, The 1560
 Redemption 962
 Regulations, London (1350) 218
 Relic, The 923
 Religious and Spiritual Life 422
 Remarks Concerning the Savages of North America
 (website)
 Remarks on the History of England (website)
 Republic, The 755
 Retired Cat, The (website)
 Revelation of Love, A 400 (website)
Richardson, Samuel (website)
 Rime Sparse 625
 Robinson Crusoe 1342
Robinson, Mary (website)
 Romeo and Juliet (Act 1, Scene 5) 632
Rowlandson, Mary (website)
 Ruin, The 70, 659
 Ruin that Befell the Great Families of Ireland, The 664
 Rule, Britannia 1628
 Salve Deus Rex Judæorum 806 (website)
 Samson Agonistes (website)
Sancho, Ignatius 1758
 Satire, A 647
 Satire against Reason and Mankind, A 1325
 Satire On Charles II, A 1324
 Satires (Donne) 926
 Saturday; The Small Pox 1558
 School of Abuse, The 757
 Scourge of Villany, The 632
 Seafarer, The 68
 Second Shepherds' Play, The 455
 Selected Letters (Montagu) (website)
 Selected Letters (Wheatley) 1752
 Sermon 438
 Set Me Whereas the Sun Doth Parch the Green 620
Shakespeare, William 632, 880 (website)
 Short Narrative of My Life, A (website)
 Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English, A 1588
 Short View of the State of Ireland, A 1510
Sidney, Sir Philip 729

- Sir Gawain and the Green Knight 225
 Sir Orfeo (website)
 Sir Walter Raleigh to His Son 812
 Skylark, The 655
 Slave Trader's Journal, A (website)
 Slavery: A Poem 1684
Smart, Christopher 1676
Smollett, Tobias (website)
 So Cruel Prison How Could Betide 621
 Sociable Letters 1163
 Song ("Go, and catch a falling star") 915
 Song [Love, a child, is ever crying] 945
 Song ("Sweetest love, I do not go") 917
 Song for St. Cecilia's Day, A 1187
 Song: To Celia 906
 Sonnet 132 (Stampa) 627
 Sonnet on the Death of Mr. Richard West 1672
 Sonnets (Barnfield) 633
 Sonnets (Daniel) 631
 Sonnets (Davies) 632
 Sonnets (Donne) 935
 Sonnets (Drayton) 631
 Sonnets (Du Bellay) 628
 Sonnets (Milton) 1004
 Sonnets (Petrarch) 625
 Sonnets (Shakespeare) 884
 Sonnets (Wroth) 945
 Sonnets (Wyatt) 611
 Sotweed Factor, The (website)
 Spectator, The 1590, 1603, 1606, 1609 (website)
 Speech as Prosecution in the Seditious-Libel Trial of Thomas Williams for Publishing Age of Reason 1600
 Speech on Conciliation with the Colonies 1708
 Speech to the House of Commons, 13 May 1789
 (website)
Spenser, Edmund (website)
 Spleen: A Pindaric Poem, The 1383
St. John Crèvecoeur, J. Hector (website)
Stampa, Gaspara 627
 Statute (1863) 220
 Statute of Anne, The 1592
 Statute of Laborers (1351) 219
Steele, Richard 1606 (website)
 Stella's Birthday (1727) 1394
 Stella's Birthday, written in the year 1718 1393
 Strond well, moder, under Rode 206
 Story of Gwion Bach, Who Became Taliesin, The (website)
 Sumer is icumen in 205
 Sun Rising, The 916
 Sweet Meat Has Source Sauce or, The Slave-Trader
 in the Dumps (website)
Swift, Jonathan 1389 (website)
 Task, The (website)
Tate, Nahum 1586
 Tatler, The No. 155 1603 (website)
 Tatler, The No. 224 1594
 Taxation No Tyranny; an Answer to the Resolutions and Addresses of the American Congress (website)
 Techt do Róim 62
 Temper (1), The 965
 There's a Young Man in Pursuit of Me 640
 Third Branch: Manawydan, son of Llyr, The (website)
 This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas 652
Thomas of Monmouth 440
Thomson, James 1621
 Thoughts and Sentiments on the Evil and Wicked Traffic of the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species
 (website)
 Thoughts on the Slavery of Negroes, as It Affects the British Colonies in the West Indies (website)
 Thresher's Labour, The (website)
 Time 970
 To a Gentleman with a Manuscript Play (website)
 To Domhnall 637
 To Her Husband, for Beating Her 663
 To His Coy Mistress 979
 To His Excellency General Washington 1748
 To John Donne 903
 To Maecenas 1740
 To My Book 902
 To My Excellent Lucasia, on Our Friendship 990
 To our most noble and virtuous Queen Katherine 763
 To Pamphilia from the Father-in-Law of Seralius 949
 To Penshurst 905
 To Rosemounde 296
 To S.M., a Young African Painter, On Seeing His Works 1746
 To Sir Henry Wotton 928
 To the Doubtful Reader 810
 To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of That Noble
 Pair, Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison 909
 To the King's Most Excellent Majesty 1742
 To the Memory of Mr. Oldham 1186
 To the Memory of My Beloved, The Author, Mr.
 William Shakespeare 907

- To the Reader 902
 To the Right Honourable William, Earl of Dartmouth,
 His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for North-America 1745
 To the Troops at Tilbury 772
 To the University of Cambridge, in New-England 1741
 To the Vagina 662
 To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time 959
 To the Virtuous Reader 805
 To William Camden 903
 Trafferth mewn Tafarn 654
 Tragical History of Doctor Faustus, The 847
 Trouble at an Inn 656
 True & Exact History of the Island of Barbados, A 1681
 True Relation of the Apparition of One Mrs. Veal the Next Day, A 1337
Turnbull, Gordon (website)
 Twelfth Night (website)
 Twicknam Garden 919
Tyndale, William 596
 Unequal Fetters, The 1387
 Upon Julia's Clothes 960
 Upon the Double Murder of King Charles 989
 Utopia (website)
 Valediction: Forbidding Mourning, A 922
 Valediction: of Weeping, A 919
 Vanity (1) 967
 Vanity of Human Wishes, The 1631
Vassa, Gustavus 1722 (website)
 Venus in the Cloister; or, The Nun in Her Smock 1583
 Verses on the Death of Dr Swift, D.S.P.D. 1397
 View of the Present State of Ireland, A (website)
 Vindication of the Rights of Men, A (website)
 Virtue 968
 Vision Showed to a Devout Woman, A 388
 Vision upon this Conceit of the Fairy Queen, A 812
Wakefield Master 453
Walpole, Horace (website)
 Wanderer, The 66
 What Atoms Make a Palsy, or Apoplexy 1149
Wheatley, John 1756
Wheatley, Phillis 1739
 When I was Fair and Young 763
 When you are very old, by candle's flame 630
 White Flour, Earthflesh, Cold Fleece 663
Whitney, Geoffrey 801 (website)
 Wife of Bath's Prologue, The 329
 Wife of Bath's Tale, The 345
 Wife's Lament, The 70
Wilberforce, William (website)
William of Pagula 430
Wilmot, John, Earl of Rochester 1323
Wimbleton, Thomas 438
 Windows, The 966
 Winter 1622
 Woe to the One Whose Sickness is Love 640, 641
Wollstonecraft, Mary (website)
 Woman Drest by Age, A 1157
 Woman's Constancy 915
 Woman's Labour: To Mr. Stephen Duck, The (website)
 Wooing of Étain, The (website)
Woolman, John 1682
Wordsworth, Dorothy (website)
Wordsworth, William (website)
 World in an Earring, A 1150
 World Made by Atoms, A 1148
 Written in Her French Psalter 761
 Written on a Wall at Woodstock 760
Wroth, Lady Mary 942
 Wyatt Resteth Here 622
Wyatt, Sir Thomas 610
Wycherley, William 1270
 Y Bardd a'r Brawd Llwyd 657
 Y Drych 656
Yearsley, Ann 1688
 Ymddiddan Rhwyng Cymro a Saesnes 661
 Yr Adfail 656
 Yr Ehedydd 652
 Yr Wylan 653

From the Publisher

A name never says it all, but the word “Broadview” expresses a good deal of the philosophy behind our company. We are open to a broad range of academic approaches and political viewpoints. We pay attention to the broad impact book publishing and book printing has in the wider world; we began using recycled stock more than a decade ago, and for some years now we have used 100% recycled paper for most titles. Our publishing program is internationally oriented and broad-ranging. Our individual titles often appeal to a broad readership too; many are of interest as much to general readers as to academics and students.

Founded in 1985, Broadview remains a fully independent company owned by its shareholders—not an imprint or subsidiary of a larger multinational.

For the most accurate information on our books (including information on pricing, editions, and formats) please visit our website at www.broadviewpress.com. Our print books and ebooks are also available for sale on our site.

On the Broadview website we also offer several goods that are not books—among them the Broadview coffee mug, the Broadview beer stein (inscribed with a line from Geoffrey Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales), the Broadview fridge magnets (your choice of philosophical or literary), and a range of T-shirts (made from combinations of hemp, bamboo, and/or high-quality pima cotton, with no child labor, sweatshop labor, or environmental degradation involved in their manufacture).

All these goods are available through the “merchandise” section of the Broadview website. When you buy Broadview goods you can support other goods too.

broadview press
www.broadviewpress.com

THE BROADVIEW ANTHOLOGY OF BRITISH LITERATURE: CONCISE EDITION

The two-volume Broadview Anthology of British Literature: Concise Edition provides an attractive alternative to the full six-volume anthology. Though much more compact, the Concise Edition nevertheless provides substantial choice, offering both a strong selection of canonical authors and a sampling of lesser-known works. With an unparalleled selection of illustrations and of contextual materials, accessible and engaging introductions, and full explanatory annotations, these volumes provide concise yet extraordinarily wide-ranging coverage for British Literature survey courses.

Authors new to the volume include Margaret Cavendish and Phyllis Wheatley; Everyman and the York Crucifixion play now appear in the bound book. Volume A now also offers substantially expanded representation of medieval and early modern Celtic literary traditions, as well as new materials related to print culture, including early modern emblems and manuscripts, and early eighteenth-century periodicals. Material that no longer appears in the bound book may in almost all cases be found on the companion website; many longer works are also available from the publisher in separate volumes that may at the instructor's request be bundled together with the anthology at little or no extra cost to the student.

General Editors:

Joseph Black, University of Massachusetts
Leonard Conolly, Trent University

Kate Flint, University of Southern California
Isobel Grundy, University of Alberta
Don LePan, Broadview Press
Roy Liuzza, University of Tennessee

Jerome J. McGann, University of Virginia
Anne Lake Prescott, Barnard College
Barry V. Qualls, Rutgers University
Claire Waters, University of California, Davis

Comments on The Broadview Anthology of British Literature

"... an exciting achievement. It sets a new standard by which all other anthologies of British Literature will now have to be measured."
Graham Hammill, State University of New York, Buffalo

"With the publication of The Broadview Anthology of British Literature, teachers and students in survey and upper-level undergraduate courses have a compelling alternative to the established anthologies by Norton and Longman.... This is a very real intellectual, as well as pedagogical, achievement."
Nicholas Watson, Harvard University

"Forty-five years [after publication], the Norton remains the 800 lb gorilla in the classroom. But it faces vigorous and growing competition from other anthologies, notably The Longman Anthology of British Literature and The Broadview Anthology of British Literature.... The most recent entry in the field, the Broadview, [is distinguished by its] selections, longer introductions, more visual material, and ... [by its] Web component."
The Chronicle of Higher Education

"... I have been using The Broadview Anthology of British Literature for three years now. I love it—and so do my students!"
Martha Stoddard-Holmes, University of California, San Marcos

"... an excellent anthology. Good selections (including some nice surprises), just the right level of annotation, affordable—and a hit with my students. I will definitely use it again."
Ira Nadel, University of British Columbia

"I have been delighted to discover The Broadview Anthology of British Literature. It offers a series of unexpected but welcome gems ... set here and there among a fine collection of the usual suspects. Its stunning combination of breadth and depth allows that most welcome of qualities in a survey class—flexibility.... The anthology is a real pleasure to use."
O.K. Smith, Kansas State University

cover: Artist unknown, detail of The Thames at Richmond, with a view of Richmond Palace, c. 1620.
(The Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge)

ISBN 978-1-55481-312-4

9 781554 813124

visit www.broadviewpress.com/babl

Printed in Canada